It is timely that this article appears now because JACK KEMP and I are introducing our Federal enterprise zone legislation tomorrow. We will be asking for cosponsors soon and ask that our colleagues read this article to see the evidence that exist in support of enterprise zones.

LOCAL INCENTIVES DRAW INDUSTRY TO POORER ZONES

(By John Herbers)

While Congress has been deadlocked for four years on President Reagan's ideas for reviving blighted urban areas, half the states and hundreds of cities are offering a range of incentives to attract jobs and industry to "enterprise zones" such as he proposed.

State officials say the movement, which has spread quietly across the country, is beginning to show results in many areas and will continue even without Federal legislation.

The concept, as acted on by states and localities, is based on a reducing of taxes and regulation and on offering low-interest loans and other incentives for businesses to settle within depressed areas of high unemployment and dependency on welfare.

A number of states without enterprise zones, including New York, are considering them, while other states, such as Massachusetts, are offering some of the same incentives for economic development in poor areas without using the "enterprise zone" label.

FROM MISSISSIPPI TO CONNECTICUT

Mr. Reagan first promoted the idea in his 1980 campaign for the White House, and although it remains controversial it has been embraced in states as diverse in economy, politics and geography as Mississippi and Connecticut. And it is being cited as a leading example of how domestic initiatives have shifted from the Federal level since Mr. Reagan took office.

"What happens to the Federal legislation is irrelevant to what we are doing here," said Carol Gaetjen, director of the Connecticut program, one of the first enacted. She pointed out that under Mr. Reagan's legislation Connecticut would probably have only one zone in which Federal incentives would be offered, whereas the state is operating six zones, each in a separate city.

In New York, the legislative Commission on Public-Private Cooperation, headed by State Senator Roy M. Goodman, Republican of Manhattan, concluded in a staff report drafted in late June after a three-month study of the phenomenon nationwide:

"Twenty-five states have enterprise zone programs, and there are now 1,281 enterprise zones in 524 different local jurisdictions. New York, Massachusetts and Michigan are the only major industrial states that have not passed enterprise zone legislation."

STATES REFINE THE IDEA

And Dick Cowden, associate director of policy for the Sabre Foundation, a private research organization based in Washington, says that although he believes Federal legislation is still needed, the states have redefined the concept by broadening the incentives beyond those in Mr. Reagan's proposal.

"The states," he says, "have developed capabilities once believed to be beyond their competence in housing, bond financing and even business loan pools and export promotion."

Although there is a consensus that it is too early to assess the success of the zones, the movement is considered important because it is the only major innovation for revitalizing those areas that contain large concentrations of poverty and unemployment, concentrations that have grown in recent years as entry-level jobs and plants have moved to the suburbs and beyond.

One indication of the interest in the movement is that national industrial real estate magazines are publishing long articles on the incentives being offered, and some localities are buying advertisements to attract businesses to the zones. For example, Streator, Ill., a small, declining city, said in an advertisement in Plants, Sites and Parks, a trade magazine, that it was offering "10-year 100 percent property tax abatement, sales and investment tax credits, waiver of local fees, income tax deductions, financing assistance, training programs and technical assistance" to industries that located in its zone, created by the state.

MANY DEMOCRATS FAVOR IDEA

Although Mr. Reagan promoted the concept of directing assistance into depressed areas, it goes against the general thrust of his policy, which is to offer aid primarily to individuals while reducing or eliminating assistance to declining communities. For the most part it has been urban Democrats rather than Reagan conservatives who have adopted the zone idea as their own at the state and local levels.

The idea behind Mr. Reagan's original legislation was to bring about community rejuvenation, job creation and capital investment through a program of reductions in property, business and investment taxes in specific blighted areas, coupled with a loosening of zoning and labor regulations. State and local contributions would expand the enticements.

Although the legislation had bipartisan support, with Representatives Jack F. Kemp, Republican of upstate New York, and Robert Garcia, Democrat of the Bronx, as sponsors in the House, it encountered opposition on several grounds. There were doubt that its tax incentives would actually create jobs, fear that enterprise zones would replace rather than augment other Federal programs, and concern that the 75 proposed zones to be spread throughout the nation in a demonstration program would place other depressed communities at a disadvantage.

The Senate passed the President's bill in 1984, but it was blocked in the House by Democratic leaders who questioned, among other things, whether businesses should be given tax breaks at a time of high Federal deficits. The legislation is being redrafted in committees, but its chances of eventual passage have been lessened and complicated by Mr. Reagan's tax proposals, which would reduce rather than increase business exemptions.

PLAN SEEN AS EFFECTIVE

Meantime, the states have proceeded with their own plans. The idea is so popular in some states that the University of Illinois and the Sabre Foundation have established long-term research plans to judge its effectiveness.

In its study of what has occurred so far, the New York legislative commission concluded, "Enterprise zoning is an effective method of improving chronically depressed neighborhoods." The Sabre Foundation found that the states "have not permitted zones to proliferate outside truly distressed areas" as Congress did in the past with a variety of antipoverty programs.

Although eligibility standards for a community to be designated as a zone vary widely from state to state, the criteria most often used include an unemployment rate substantially above the state average, a loss in population of 10 percent or more since 1970 and an incidence of poverty considerably higher than the average.

The most common incentives include tax credits based on the number of new employees, exemption from sales taxes on materials used for construction, abatements in real estate taxes, tax credits or deductions for capital improvements or employee training programs, offerings of low-interest loans to help businesses get started, and improvement of streets, water mains and sewers within the zone.

Most states have taken industrial development programs already under way and expanded the benefits for development within the zones. Since 1979, when Federal grants began to decline, most of the states have stepped up efforts to enhance development through a variety of incentives in communities of all kinds.

These examples point up some of the diversity in state approaches:

Connecticut: State officials say the state's small zones in the downtown areas of Bridgeport, Norwalk, New London, New Britain, New Haven and Hartford attracted $107 million in business investment, mostly by small concerns, and 3,668 new jobs in the two-year period ended last October, because of a range of incentives. The program is under review, and some critics say much of the development might have occurred anyway with the state's expanding economy.

New Jersey: Administration of a new law that provides tax credits and exemptions is now getting under way, with zones designated in Camden and Newark. Two zones may be added each year, with no more than 10 at any time.

Pennsylvania: The program puts more emphasis on loans to businesses than on tax incentives, and Gov. Dick Thornburgh, a Republican, says it has been used successfully to rehabilitate vacant steel mills, department stores and other enterprises and to subsidize transportation in old industrial cities of all sizes.

Kentucky: Corporations owned by residents of Kentucky's zones are eligible for dollar-a-year leases on commercial buildings and are exempt from all state and local taxes. In one zone in Louisville, labor unions have added to state-sponsored incentives by promising not to strike for 20 years if employers promised to resolve disputes by arbitration.

Louisiana: The state law requires that at least one-fourth of the state's census tracts qualify as enterprise zones. Businesses in urban zones are eligible for five-year exemptions from state taxes. Businesses in rural zones are entitled to a $2,500 tax credit for each new worker.

There is disagreement as to whether the Federal Government will ever establish enterprise zones. Although many state officials are indifferent about what Washington will do, Mr. Cowden of the Sabre Foundation says, "It is no longer true to say that the primary advocates of zones are the Reagan Administration and conservatives generally."

"As each new state passes an enterprise zone bill," he says, "two new senators and several representatives have a reason to vote for the measure, a fact that has been reflected in committee actions. If the states sustain their interest, some form of Federal zone policy will be inevitable."●

STRENGTHEN INADEQUATE SUPERFUND BILL

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, last week the House Energy and Commerce Committee voted to report a bill reauthorizing the Superfund program. This bill contains several fatal flaws, which must be addressed as it proceeds through the legislative process.

Among other items, the bill does not establish standards or meaningful deadlines for Superfund cleanups; fails to give citizens the right to sue private parties to force cleanup; preempts stricter State cleanup laws unless the State pays for the additional cleanup; contains a blatant bailout for major oil companies for damages caused by leaking underground storage tanks; and substantially weakens the liability of polluters for cleanup costs.

A recent editorial in the Philadelphia Inquirer analyzes these deficiencies in some detail and I would commend this analysis to my colleagues' attention.

HOUSE SUPERFUND BILL LOOKS BETTER THAN IT IS

Things aren't always what they seem. Consider, for instance, the House version of the Superfund reauthorization bill. On the surface, it looks pretty good. Funding of $10 billion (not as much as actually is needed, but better than the Senate bottom-line of $7.5 billion and a whale of a lot better than the Reagan administration's proposed $5.3 billion). A variety of provisions calling for clean-up schedules and standards (in short supply in the Senate and administration versions of the reauthorization bill).

Look closer, however, and there's almost nothing there—nothing that can be counted upon to protect Americans over the next five years from the hazards of abandoned chemical wastes.

Standards and schedules have been eliminated or weakened so as to be meaningless. Provisions making liable individuals or companies responsible for improperly disposing of toxic wastes have been gutted. For example, late last week, the House Energy and Commerce Committee set a $3 million limit on liability for damages caused by leaking underground storage tanks regardless of the extent of damage, or the assets of the company that owns the leaking tank. Leaks in underground chemical and gasoline storage tanks have been blamed for widespread contamination of drinking water supplies. While a liability limit might be appropriate for the corner gas station owner, it is hardly appropriate for giant oil corporations argue critics, but the committee made no distinction.

And while they were at it, committee members also barred individuals from using the Environmental Protection Agency to force the agency to clean up waste sites.

There is a growing sentiment in Washington that it would be better to abandon the Superfund effort, extend the existing law for a year and hope things will be better next year. The reason is simple: 1986 is an election year. In 1984, another election year, House members fell over themselves embracing Superfund. The Senate, however, failed to act, forcing action this year when the program is scheduled to expire. Advocates of strong legislation argue that no member of Congress up for re-election will want a string of weakening Superfund votes beside his or her name.

Perhaps Postponing the vote is an alternative that should not be ruled out for the time being, but there still is time to salvage the House bill. As last week's House committee, votes demonstrate there is one special interest that has not been heard from yet—the public. It could be that the $10 billion price tag on the House passed bill has lulled people into thinking that they'll be getting a worthwhile enforcement package for their money. That's where appearances can be deceiving.

Without strong guidance from Congress in the form of clean-up standards and schedules, EPA will drag its feet on Superfund programs regardless of how much money the Congress appropriates.

That's the message advocates of a Superfund with teeth will be spreading in the next few weeks, an members of Congress head back to their home districts during the August recess. When they return to Washington in September, Superfund will be waiting. Whether they've heard the message—and heeded their responsibility to protect the American public from chemical hazards—will become apparent in the zeal and dedication of their salvage efforts.●

THE PENSION PLAN REVERSION MORATORIUM ACT OF 1985

HON. EDWARD R. ROYBAL

OF CALIFORNIA

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, in an attempt to address the problem of "overfunded" pension fund terminations by employers which deprive American workers and retirees of their retirement income security, I am introducing, the Pension Plan Reversion Moratorium Act of 1985. Although I introduced legislation on June 6, the Plan Termination and Reversion Control Act of 1985, H.R. 2701, designed to curtail "overfunded" plan terminations, a discouraging number of these termination requests continue to be processed by the administration while the bill awaits consideration by the Committee on Education and Labor and the Committee on Ways and Means.

As chairman of the House Select Committee on Aging, I have called on the administration to support a temporary moratorium on further "overfunded" private pension plan terminations. I have asked the administration to assist me in a legislative effort to impose a 9-month moratorium on the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation [PBGC] and the Internal Revenue Service in the processing of new notices of intent to terminate, and determination letters concerning defined benefit pension plans. The bill would suspend further processing of applications while Congress studies the issue and considers appropriate legislative remedies. Similar legislation is being introduced by Senator HOWARD METZENBAUM in the Senate.

On June 10, 1985, United Airlines announced the proposed recapture of $962 million from the termination of pension plans covering United Airlines employees and retirees. The proposed asset reversion would be the largest to date. Prior to the announcement by United Airlines, a total of 729 completed and pending plan terminations had already accounted for more than $6.7 billion in recaptured plan assets since 1980. There is every indication that overfunded terminations will continue and that the "Implementation Guidelines" of the administration serve as a prime catalyst for this continuing trend. It should be noted that both the number of termination applications and amounts obtained by employers from overfunded terminations increased dramatically in 1984, after issuance of the guidelines, realizing some $3.1 billion in excess assets to employers in 1984 alone.

The administration is well aware of the deficiencies of its guidelines approach to asset reversions by employers. Both the Treasury Department and the Internal Revenue Service have indicated in internal memoranda that a number of concerns remain unresolved by the guidelines. The Treasury Department and the Internal Revenue Service have noted that:

Even though the guidelines policy requires the annuitization of benefits accured as of a reversion transaction, the security of participants' benefits generally will be diminished by such transactions. This is particularly true with respect to ancillary benefits, such as subsidized early retirement benefits, that need not be annuitized upon termination of a plan (and are not guaranteed by the PBGC).

The elimination of excess assets from a defined benefit plan will eliminate a source of funds that some employers have used to provide benefit increases (e.g., cost-of-living adjustments) to current employees and retirees.

Because the guidelines policy will facilitate employers in extracting assets from ongoing defined benefit plans, such plans will be increasingly vulnerable to use as tax-favored savings accounts for the benefit of employers. The tax-favored treatment provided to qualified plans thus will accrue to the benefit of employers, rather than employees.

With a recognition of these and other shortcomings of the administration's policy in this area, it becomes imperative for the Congress to move swiftly to impose a moratorium and to move to enact substantive legislation which protects workers and retirees from the loss of their retirement security from "overfunded" pension plan terminations.

The workers and retirees that write to the Select Committee on Aging regarding the loss of their retirement security through overfunded terminations are devastated by the actions of their employer and the failure of their Government to protect them. These are men and women who regard their pension benefits as their principal protection and security in old age and they cannot understand why their Government would countenance such terminations. As Richard Ippolito, Director of Research at the Department of Labor's pension program, notes in his report entitled "Issues Surrounding Pension Terminations for Reversion,"

First, unless otherwise offset by higher wages or new plans, terminations appear to be costly to workers, representing reductions in (presumably) expected real pensions that could easily be in the vicinity of 50 percent. Second, even if firms take steps to offset worker losses, funding levels in surviving plans will be reduced to the legal limit, creating more risk for workers that the plan may not be economic in the long run . . . If the termination truly represents the firm unilaterally breaking an implicit contract with workers, a case can be made that the reversion belongs to the workers, not the firm.

Why are corporations terminating their pension plans? A number of companies now find themselves with more assets in their pension plans than are needed to pay vested benefits. By terminating a pension plan, employers can recapture so-called excess assets which remain after the plan's termination liabilities have been satisfied. Originally contributed by plan sponsors to fund future pension benefits, the recaptured assets will instead be used for other corporate purposes.

According to a press release issued by United Airlines, the pension plans are being terminated so that "excess" assets will not serve as an inducement for a hostile corporate takeover. Other companies use recaptured assets for capital investments, to improve profitability on corporate balance sheets, or to finance corporate acquisitions.

In overfunded pension plan terminations, both employees and retirees may lose valuable retirement benefits they will need to make their retirement financially secure. Pensions under a successor plan (if any) may be significantly less generous. It should be noted that the administration guidelines do not require crediting for past service in any successor plan. By recapturing "excess" assets, employers strip away the "cushion" of plan assets employees formerly had to ensure that poor plan investment performance would not jeopardize the future solvency of their pension plan. Retirees will lose ad hoc cost-of-living adjustments because the excess assets which typically fund such increases will now be taken by the employer upon termination.

The Pension Plan Reversion Moratorium Act of 1985 would:

(1) Impose a moratorium effective for any notice of intent to terminate and any request for any qualification determination letter pursuant to a plan termination of a defined benefit pension plan received after June 12, 1985; and

(2) Enable the Congress to commission a study by the General Accounting Office, in consultation with U.S. Department of Labor, Department of Treasury, Internal Revenue Service, and the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation, to examine the trend and problems arising out of overfunded defined benefit pension plan terminations and reversion of excess assets to employers.

Such a study would examine the reasons behind the increased trend of overfunded terminations, their impact on workers and retirees and their retirement income security, the impact of such terminations and reversions on the development and maintenance of defined benefit pension plans and on the private pension system and the collateral effects that might be experienced by the PBGC.

In conclusion, I urge my colleagues to give careful consideration to the merits of this legislation. The Congress must not allow pension plans to become a sacrificial lamb on the alter of corporate expediency. To do otherwise is to allow the steady erosion of the retirement income security of additional thousands of American workers and retirees. Please cosponsor and support enactment of the Pension Plan Reversion Moratorium Act of 1985 for American workers and retirees.●

COMPUTER SOFTWARE ROYALTIES

HON. ED ZSCHAU

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. ZSCHAU. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be introducing today the bill H.R. 3124, to amend the Internal Revenue Code so that computer software royalties would not be subject to personal holding company provisions.

I believe this bill goes a long way toward alleviating a crisis that has developed in one of this country's leading growth industries, computer software. The United States leads the world in productivity enhancing software technology written by relatively young, small scale, entrepreneurial operations. Most of these companies have only been in the business a short time and are growing at a rapid rate.

These software companies face vigorous competition from companies in the United States and around the world. In this competitive environment, a company which does not constantly advance is likely to find that its software products have become obsolete. Increased levels of investment in R&D are necessary just to avoid technologies obsolescence, Staying on top means that for most software companies, a very high percentage of retained earnings is not paid out in dividends to shareholders but, rather, is reinvested R&D.

It has become increasingly clear that the economic progress of the United States depends in large part upon the prosperity and growth of high-technology industries, particularly computer software. But if we are to make growth of high technologies industries an economic priority, it is important that we ascertain whether existing Federal tax policies provide a favorable environment for these high-tech companies. At the very least our tax policies should not impede their growth and competition both at home and abroad.

The software industry has been faced with what you might call a gap between law and technology. What I am talking about is demonstrated by a recent IRS ruling, which exposes computer software companies to serious personal holding company tax liability.

Letter Ruling 8450025, issued by the Internal Revenue Service last September, classifies software license and maintenance fees as passive income. The ruling holds that any company that receives most of its income from software license and maintenance fees may be subjected to the personal holding company tax penalties assessed against undistributed earnings.

This ruling hits hardest on small, closely held companies involved in some of the most innovative software development. This group was never intended to be affected by the personal holding company rules: In fact, there were no software companies in existence when the personal holding company rules were created.

The personal holding company rules were designed to attack "incorporated pocketbooks"; that is, corporations formed strictly to shelter personal income. At the time the personal holding company rules were created, corporate tax rates were much lower than individual rates, and many individuals tried to avoid paying the higher tax by declaring themselves to be corporations even though they did not have active businesses. This was the tax avoidance scheme that the personal holding company rules sought to eliminate. Unfortunately, innovative software companies, with active and ongoing business operations, get tarred with the same brush.

The personal holding company rules are applied mechanically. When a business meets certain definitional requirements, it may be classified as a personal holding company, regardless of whether the company is in fact a shelter or an active business. The problem with mechanical rules is that unintentioned inequities may result when the rules are applied to new situations or circumstances. This is exactly the case with the software industry.

Computer software is generally licensed to customers rather than being sold. License agreements are necessary in order to protect the developer's substantial investment in research and development and to protect its intellectual property rights. The licensee is given a limited set of rights to use the software, but the transaction is not a "sale" and the licensee does not "own" the program. Software developers also provide maintenance and support service which insure that errors are corrected, functions are enhanced, and the program runs smoothly and efficiently. These maintenance and support services are necessary to the licensee if the programs are to be of continuing utility. Unfortunately, under current regulations the IRS views both license and maintenance fees as passive royalty income.

If software companies confirm to be faced with a personal holding company tax liability, many of them will not be able to maintain high quality R&D programs. Moreover, some software developers may find themselves put right out of business by the tax. Clearly, the elimination of this unintended application of personal holding company provisions is necessary if we are to remain competitive in the computer software markets.

The legislation I am introducing today would exempt computer software royalties from passive income. A software company would not be subject to the personal holding company tax if more than 50 percent of its adjusted ordinary gross income comes from computer software royalties. "Computer software royalties" is defined to mean, compensation, however designated, which is derived in the active conduct of a trade or business, and which is received for the use of, or the right to use, a computer program.

Computer software royalty income will not be the only qualification for the exemption. A software company will also have to demonstrate that it has allowable deductions under sections 162 or 174 of the Internal Revenue Code, which are allocable to the trade or business in which the royalties are derived, equal or exceeding 15 percent of the company's adjusted gross income. For purposes of this section, compensation to major shareholders for personal services will be excluded from the calculation of allowable deductions. This in effect requires that the company's operations extend beyond merely the efforts of its major shareholders. The major shareholders whose services are excluded from the category of qualified expenses are defined as the fewest number of shareholders whose combined ownership interest exceeds 50 percent in value of the outstanding stock of the corporation.

H.R. 3124 also provides that section 553(a) of the Internal Revenue Code be amended to exclude computer software royalties from the definition of foreign personal holding company income if the proposed exceptions for domestic person holding company income are met. It also provides that these changes would be retroactive to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1975, so that the software companies which were founded during this period do not find themselves left with exposure to a penalty tax that should never have applied to them in the first place.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation is needed by a dynamic segment of our economy. It is fair to stop applying tax provisions to businesses for which they were never intended in the first place, and it is essential in order to preserve and enhance U.S. leadership in computer software.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

H.R. 3124

A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 with respect to the treatment of computer software royalties for purposes of the personal holding company provisions

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. TREATMENT OF COMPUTER SOFTWARE ROYALTIES.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—Subsection (a) of section 543 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (defining personal holding company income) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(9) COMPUTER SOFTWARE ROYALTIES.—

"(A) Computer software royalties; except that such royalties shall not be included if—

"(i) such royalties constitute 50 percent or more of the adjusted gross income, and

"(ii) the sum of the deductions (other than for compensation for personal services rendered by persons in the top group of shareholders) which are allowable under section 162 or 174 and which are allocable to the trade or business in which such royalties are derived equals or exceeds 15 percent of the adjusted ordinary gross income.

"(B) For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'computer software royalties' means compensation (however designated) which is derived in the active conduct of a trade or business and which is received for the use of, or the right to use, a computer program (as defined in section 101 of title 17, United States Code).

"(C) For purposes of this paragraph, the top group of shareholders is the group consisting of the fewest number of individuals whose combined ownership interest meets the stock ownership requirements of section 542(a)(2).

"(D) Paragraphs (1) and (4) shall not apply to computer software royalties."

(b) FOREIGN PERSONAL HOLDING COMPANIES.—Paragraph (1) of section 553(a) of such Code (defining foreign personal holding company income) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "This paragraph shall not apply to computer software royalties (as defined in section 543(a)(9)(B)) if the requirements of clauses (i) and (ii) of section 543(a)(9)(A) are met."

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1975.●

BLACK COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES NEED ADDITIONAL SUPPORT

HON. JOHN CONYERS, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, the Nation's 105 traditionally black colleges and universities have a long-standing history, dating back to the 1850's of educating black Americans. These institutions have done an outstanding job throughout the years, and their role is even more important today. Sixty-two percent of all blacks who have undergraduate degrees received them from black colleges, 45 percent of all blacks who received their masters degrees obtained them from these institutions, and more than half of our black doctors received their medical degrees from historically black colleges and universities.

Furthermore, it is also considering H.R. 2907, the Institutional Aid Act of 1985, which was introduced by Congressman AUGUSTUS HAWKINS, chairman of the House Committee on Education and Labor, and our former colleague, Senator PAUL SIMON, who has introduced it in the Senate.

As a cosponsor of both bills, I fully and actively support both of them, especially H.R. 2907 which revises title III funding for historically black colleges and universities, it is important that the Congress continue to recognize and support the vital roles which our historically black institutions continue to play.

I strongly urge my colleagues to support the legislation reauthorizing the Higher Education Act, and H.R. 2907 the Institutional Aid Act. The following is a copy of the testimony which I gave at his morning's hearing:

TESTIMONY OF CONGRESSMAN JOHN CONYERS, JR., GIVEN BEFORE THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR'S SUBCOMMITTEE ON POSTSECONDARY EDUCATION IN SUPPORT OF H.R. 2907

Chairman Hawkins, Chairman Ford, and distinguished members of the House Committee on Education and Labor's Subcommittee on Postsecondary Education, it is my honor on behalf of the members of the Congressional Black Caucus, to have the opportunity to come before this committee and to voice my support for the reauthorization of the Higher Education Act of 1965. Not long ago, I met with various college presidents in the Detroit area, and they indicated that this legislation was a matter of critical importance to them and the students which they serve.

Second, I would like to lend my strong endorsement for H.R. 2907, the Institutional Aid Act of 1985, which has been introduced by Chairman Hawkins on the House side and Senator Paul Simon on the Senate side. It is my hope that this measure, especially the black college and university provision, will be incorporated into the Higher Education Act which this subcommittee is considering.

I make that endorsement, Mr. Chairman, because I am a strong supporter of our Nation's historically black colleges and universities, institutions which, since 1850, have provided hope for hundreds of thousands of black Americans. I might add that they continue to provide that hope today.

While there are several higher educational institutions that are predominantly black in Detroit, there are not historically black colleges or universities. Yet, not a day passes that I don't see the works of the able men and women who are graduates of these historically black institutions which are mostly located in our Southern States.

A large number of Detroit's black doctors, dentists, lawyers, teachers, businesspersons, and other professionals graduated from the Nation's traditional black institutions. When you talk with them, as I have on many occasions, they will quickly tell you that had not it been for these institutions, Mr. Chairman, they most likely would not have been in the professional fields where they serve today.

In many cases, particularly if you lived in the South, you had no choice but to attend these institutions because racism was, in effect, the law of the land.

I might add, Mr. Chairman, that several of my staff members are graduates of black institutions, or have taught at these institutions.

Today, many say that there is no longer a need for our historically black institutions. That in today's world, they have become dinosaurs. Nothing could be farther from the truth. A handful of black institutions still produces half of the graduates in America who are black. In fact, 62 percent of blacks who received their undergraduate degrees received them from black colleges, 45 percent of all blacks who received their masters degrees obtained them from these institutions, and half of the practicing black doctors in the United States received their medical degrees from Meharry Medical College or Howard University.

It is incredible that less than 1 percent of the Nation's 3,000 colleges and universities have produced more than half of all blacks who have graduated from our higher educational system.

When we look at the current high unemployment rate among blacks, the high poverty level, the high infant mortality rate, and the disproportionate number of blacks in our prison system, deep in our hearts, we know that equality and justice are still distant dreams for 30 million black Americans.

Under the current administration, things have gotten worse as evidenced by their steady assaults on affirmative action, civil rights, voters' rights, and court decisions as well as legislation involving our educational system. In fact, it was this administration that proposed giving tax breaks to higher education institutions which practiced overt racial discrimination.

These institutions, both private and public, were started by either religious denominations or by State mandate. In the case of the latter, States preferred to start black colleges rather than integrate existing institutions for whites only. The problem was that they never allocated equal financial resources to the black institutions.

I remind you that these practices were reenforced by the law of the land, including those of the Federal Government. It was not that long ago that the Governor of Alabama stood in the doorway of the University of Alabama and said: "Never." Today, he says he is a member of the Rainbow Coalition.

It may be a surprise to some of you that the Nation's historically black colleges and universities have never practiced discrimination, and that their doors have always been open to students and faculty regardless of race, creed, or color.

Mr. Chairman, I am not here today to criticize any of the Nation's 3,000 higher educational institutions. In fact, I commend their efforts, in my own district, there are a variety of public, private, and religious-affiliated institutions, most of them have done a very good job of educating minority students, but the fact remains that the majority of black college graduates attended one of America's 105 historically black colleges and universities.

It is important to note that the vast majority of these graduates come from families that are poor. Yet, black colleges and universities for the past century have almost always been able to provide them with a good education. Many who came from economically disadvantaged areas tend to return to help others.

When I think of the number of black leaders and professionals such as the late Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., Rev. Jesse Jackson, Justice Thurgood Marshall, and Detroit's Judge Wade McCree, Judge Damon Keith, Mayor Coleman Young, Congressman George Crockett, Jr., Wayne State University's Vice President Arthur Johnson, and superintendent of Highland Park's School System, Dr. Thomas Lloyd, Jr., one can easily see that they have done a tremendous job in producing leaders for blacks Americans as well as all Americans. But the work of these institutions is not yet finished.

Over the years, title III funds have been very valuable to the historically black colleges and universities as they continue their efforts of educating the majority of blacks who graduate from higher education institutions, yet, title III funding to black colleges has continued to shrink. In 1984, they received only 35 percent of the title III funds compared to about 60 percent in 1966. They are slowly being graduated out of the program.

Black college officials blame their declining share of the money on changes in the rules for title III eligibility which allowed more colleges to qualify for grants.

The aid that black colleges have received has not been enough to eliminate their deficiencies which are largely due to many years of underfunding by the Federal Government, and in the case of the public institutions, the various State governments.

As Sterling Henry of the NAACP has noted, "the title III program was designed to be a program for black colleges. But some predominantly white institutions contend that they are just as deserving of aid from the program as are colleges that concentrate on ethnic minorities."

Some complain that many black colleges have received aid as "developing" colleges for years and see the program as a permanent source of support. As one who has been in the Congress for over 20 years, it has always been my belief that Congress intended the money to go primarily to black colleges but it did not want to use race-specific language in the highly charged civil rights' ERA.

Former Congresswoman Edith Green, author of original title III program to aid developing institutions, said the program was not intended to be "a cooperative venture among the top ten colleges and universities, but rather we conceived it primarily to strengthen the negro colleges in the South."

Dr. Norman Francis, president of Xavier University in Louisiana also noted that everyone in the world knew at the time when the program was created that "developing meant historically black colleges."

Why should we distinguish predominantly black colleges from historically black colleges? The financial condition of the school and the financial condition of the student are two different criteria; one is far worse than the other. When you take a poor student and put him or her in a poor college that has always been poor, you have an entirely different situation than that of a student attending an institution which is used to being given everything that it needs. It is our responsibility to expand and enhance these institutions so they can keep on doing what they have done well.

It is with these thoughts in mind that I encourage members of this committee to incorporate H.R. 2907 into the legislation reauthorizing the Higher Education Act. We have seen what can happen to a society where higher education is available only to the wealthy and the middle class. Remember, "a mind is a terrible thing to waste."

Included for the record is an editorial which appeared in the July 27, 1985 issue of the Michigan Chronicle.

The editorial follows:

A Matter of Black Pride

One of the tragic stories of our times is the plight of the predominantly Black institutions of higher learning in this country. There are a number of factors involved in what appears to be continuing deterioration of many of these institutions, particularly those which are privately endowed. Prime among these factors is the obvious lack of interest on the part of the alumni, many of whom used these schools as stepping stones to successful careers.

According to a report in a recent edition of the Chronicle of Higher Education, "four prominent, historically Black institutions are having accreditation problems, and all four exhibit the same pattern: declining enrollment, internal turmoil and multi-million dollar deficits.

"The institutions, all of which are now fighting to retain accreditation, are Bishop College, Cheyney University, Fisk University and Knoxville College. One two year institution, Motown College, also remains on probation, because of its weak financial condition."

A check of the Black "Who's Who in America" would reveal a number of highly successful Americans who are alumni of the above mentioned colleges, particularly Fisk University in Nashville which was once one of the most prestigious of the nation's privately endowed schools.

The problems at Fisk have made national headlines over a period of years and yet there seems to be a total inability to come to grips with the financial and administrative policies of the university that would enable it to plow its way through troubled waters.

The stories emanating from the campuses listed above are being repeated on a number of other campuses and danger signals are being heard loud and clear. There are several organizations which are attempting to address themselves to the concerns of the traditional Black colleges which deserve national concern, if for no other reason than the remarkable contributions they have made to the nation as a whole. Somehow, somewhere, however, there must be an awakening of Black Americans to a responsibility that has not yet been properly assumed.

Close to a half century ago, Frederick Patterson, then president of Tuskegee Institute, saw the threatening clouds on the horizon when he began to note the decline in private philanthropy that had kept the doors of the predominantly Black colleges open. With the aid of Ira Lewis, then publisher of the Pittsburgh Courier, Patterson launched an idea that became the United Negro College Fund (UNCF).

The UNCF was the initial attempt to have Blacks become more involved not only in the financial support of the colleges which had become the cornerstone of education for Blacks across the nation, but also in having the alumni of these schools become more active in the affairs of the institutions.

The UNCF has served valiantly ever since it was created by these two forward looking men and yet it has failed to sufficiently involve enough of the communities across the nation in keeping these institutions alive.

There is still a great need for the Black colleges in spite of the great advances made since the UNCF was organized in opening the doors of institutions that once barred persons of color from their domains. The Fisks, the Cheyneys, the Bishops, the Knoxville and Morristown colleges must be kept alive. It is obvious, however, that there must be a much greater involvement of concerned Blacks in the affairs of these schools.

There is no reason why the citizens of Pennsylvania should have allowed Cheyney, a state supported institution, to have reached a point where its accreditation is being threatened because of what the assessment commission charged was "years of neglect." There is no reason why Fisk University, one of the great traditions of Black America, should reach the point where it faces the possibility of having to close its doors.

The painful crisis facing these institutions are a challenge to every Black American concerned about the future of their children. It is a challenge that must be faced or this whole matter of interest in Black pride will have to be re-examined.●

INTERSTATE BANKING

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, during committee consideration of H.R. 2707, a bill that would authorize full interstate banking by 1990, many of my colleagues raised concerns regarding the effect interstate banking would have on small banks' ability to compete with the money center banks.

At the time I brought to my colleagues' attention the situation in New York State during the 1970's when bank zones were deregulated. The large New York City banks "invaded" the upstate New York market, and were quickly rebuffed by the long established hometown banks. The point is, banks that know their customers and give them the services they need at affordable rates need not fear out of State banks coming in and stealing their clients.

I enclose an article from the June/July issue of Economic Review which illustrates the point. This article is informative and "must" reading for those for, and against, interstate banking.

UPSTATE NEW YORK: TOUGH MARKETS FOR CITY BANKS

(B. Frank King)

Do larger banks necessarily enjoy insurmountable competitive advantages over smaller ones? The question of large banks' impact on smaller competitors lies at the heart of nearly all disagreements about easing geographic restrictions on banking.[1]

Many who oppose the liberalization of restrictions on banks' geographic expansion have argued that inherent advantages of larger banks allow them to jeopardize the market share and profitability of smaller banks and, eventually, to absorb them. Easing cross-state restrictions, these skeptics warn, will doom small institutions and eliminate the special service they provide to individuals and small-business customers.

Despite its popular appeal, this hypothesis has failed empirical tests consistently. One of its basic premises—that large banks are able to capture significant economies of scale or scope—has been tested in many studies; it has yet to find support. Further, several studies conclude that large banks entering new areas fail to win significant increases in market share or to reduce bank earnings seriously in the communities entered.

Yet the argument that large banks have an inherent advantage continues to win proponents, and not without reason. Studies of economies of scale in banking typically have used data from the 1960s and 1970s. Most studies of market entry by large banks also focus on a period before ceilings on interest payable on time and savings deposits began to be phased out under the Depository Institutions Deregulation and Monetary Control Act of 1980. Phasing out these ceilings may have diminished the advantages of local-office convenience and enhanced the competitive powers of both banks and thrift institutions by allowing them to offer market rates on a gradually increasing proportion of their deposits. The ceilings have improved large banks' ability to compete with smaller banks, or conversely, may have provided the smaller institutions an edge.

Banks' experience since 1980 should provide timely insight into large banks' current advantages. One of the most fruitful grounds for an analysis of large banks' experience is upstate New York, where some of our country's largest banks in the 1970s entered markets (such as Albany, Binghamton, and Elmira) dominated by smaller banks. Two previous studies have documented that the New York City banks, through 1980, had failed to enlarge their footholds significantly in upstate markets.[2]

An analysis of the most recently available data indicates that the upstate New York competitive situation has changed little, despite banks' new powers to compete for deposits. Relaxation of interest ceilings and the institutions' new authority to offer money market deposit accounts (MMDAs) and Super NOW (negotiable order of withdrawal) accounts apparently failed to enhance large New York City banks' ability to gain market share at the expense of other banks in these areas they entered through de novo and foothold acquisitions. The big banks' penetration remains low and their changes in market share since 1980—through generally positive—have been modest.

Evidence from this tough proving ground gives no indication that the regulatory changes of the early 1980s have made it any easier for some of the nation's largest banks to enter markets in competition against smaller banks. Deposit interest deregulation has continued since June 1983, possibly shifting the competitive balance between large and small banks still more. However, the record of 1980–1983 gives no indication that a transition is occurring.

THE ISSUE OF LARGE BANKS' ADVANTAGE

Except for the very largest banks, each broad banking size group tends to argue that larger banks have advantages that allow them to threaten small banks' market share and profitability and eventually to acquire the smaller banks. This can be a persuasive argument, particularly to legislatures, which typically are sympathetic to smaller businesses.

In the 1980s, even larger regional banks have argued, in supporting regional reciprocal interstate banking laws, that they should be given time to grow within their region to avoid being acquired by large money center institutions when national interstate banking arrives.[3] More often, though, the argument that large banks have inherent advantages has assumed that the smaller banks in question are community banks faced with the prospect of competing with regional and money center banks.

The Depository Institutions Deregulation and Monetary Control Act of 1980 and the Garn-St Germain Act of 1982 added to concern about the large bank-small bank issue. These pieces of legislation increased the number of institutions empowered to offer a full line of consumer financial services from about 14,000 commercial banks to more than 40,000 banks, thrifts and credit unions. They also added some 3,500 thrifts to the number of institutions able to offer a full line of business financial services. The question of larger institutions' advantage was underlined by the fact that some of these new competitors were larger than the commercial banks they were authorized to compete against.

Over the last two decades many studies have cast doubt on the assertion that larger banks have advantages that will allow them to overwhelm smaller banks. These studies have approached the issue from two directions: studies of economies of scale and scope in various samples of banks, and studies of changes in markets where the large banks began competing with smaller banks.

Little evidence has been found that large banks possess inherent advantages. A recent summary of evidence on large banks' advantages concludes that, "with remarkable consistency, the studies reported here suggest that large size does not seem to give a financial institution a significant competitive advantage."[4]

Studies have found that banks can achieve significant economies of scale in producing basic banking services only up to asset sizes of $50 million to $100 million, and the research has produced little evidence to demonstrate economies of scale for individual basic products. These studies use different approaches, but their evidence is consistent.[5] More recently, researchers have studied economies of scope—the effects on costs of combining a group of related production processes in one operation—in banking with similar results: no cost advantages for large banks are evident.[6]

The second type of study of large banks' advantages looks at the effects of size in banking markets. Such an approach avoids several criticisms often leveled at economies of scale studies because it views the large bank as a whole and assesses its ability to attract customers in a market situation. Results of these studies generally are consistent with studies of economies of scale and scope; they conclude that larger institutions usually gain neither significant market share nor erode local banks' profitability when they enter smaller banks' markets. This has been shown in many types of entry and markets.[7]

Recent changes in financial system regulation and technology have made evidence in these studies potentially less relevant in today's environment, however. Better communications technology and the substitution of rate for convenience competition are making local offices less important.[8] The phased removal of regulatory restrictions on interest payable on time deposits and the introduction of new deposit accounts open up new dimensions of competition among depository institutions. These dimensions, not directly relevant to studies of economies of scale, were unavailable when most studies of large banks' market performance were undertaken.

The decline in importance of the local office and the introduction of deposit interest competition may have become crucial as interest rate ceilings have been removed and as new deposit products—such as money market certificates (1978), MMDAs (late 1982) and Super NOW accounts (early 1983)—were introduced.[9] Larger banks' alleged advantages in raising funds, it might be reasoned, could allow them to pay higher interest on deposits. In addition, the large banks' purported advertising advantages could help them attract deposit accounts when interest rate competition is allowed. Although interest rate ceilings will not be removed completely from time and savings deposits until early next year, data already available should provide evidence of any sharp shift in large banks' competitive abilities since phased removal of the ceilings began in 1980.

A CASE STUDY

New York provides a useful case study of the impact of this changing environment. Money center banks from New York City moved upstate with de novo and foothold entries in the early 1970s.[10] The 1970 amendments to the Bank Holding Company Act that eliminated advantages of operating as a one-bank holding company allowed large New York City banks to consider upstate bank acquisitions without fear of losing other advantages. Further, a 1971 state act liberalized the conditions under which New York City banks could branch in upstate markets. In compliance with State Banking Department policy, they entered by establishing new banks or branches or by acquiring banks with small market shares.[11]

The performance of these banks in the new markets has been reported in two earlier studies.[12] Kunreuther found that, through 1975, New York City banks had little success penetrating upstate markets. Golembe Associates extended the record of de novo and foothold acquisitions through 1980 and reported similar findings. Through June 1980, Golembe reported 29 of the 33 de novo and foothold banks and branches acquired in upstate metropolitan areas had gained a somewhat larger share of the market; one lost share. Two entrants had ceased operations and one changed character in a way that made its experiences irrelevant. The average market share was only 1.8 percent; and fully 13 operations had gained less than one point. All the de novo operations that remained (18) had gained market share, but their average share at mid-1980 was a mere 1.5 percent. The largest de novo share was 5.2 percent at that time; six de novos had market shares of less than 1 percent. Market share gains by foothold acquisitions (12) averaged only 0.9 percentage points. The largest gain was 2.7 points.[13]

Between 1980 and 1983, New York City banks changed their upstate market shares by buying or selling offices in a few instances. Bankers Trust, for instance, decided to sell its upstate offices entirely and completed some of the program by mid-1983. In measuring share changes for this study, sales of offices (but not purchases) were counted as share changes. This seemingly asymmetrical treatment is used because office sales indicate that a firm is giving up in one market to pursue more attractive opportunities in another. Office purchases, on the other hand, increase market share by external means rather than through local market competition.

When these external changes are accounted for, however, changes in New York City banks' upstate market shares between mid-1980 and mid-1983 show even smaller gains than in the entry-mid-1980 period. The large banks gained market share more often than they lost share, but gains averaged only one percentage point. The largest single share gain in any market was 9.5 points. The largest loss was 2.8 points in another market. At least one New York City bank lost market share in five of the eight upstate metropolitan areas analyzed in this study. Two lost share in three of the markets. (Share changes are detailed in Table 1.)

[2] Citicorp operates in Rochester, but its offices have a substantial volume of nonlocal deposits.

Overall, market share changes averaged a positive 0.7 percentage points, only about one-third of the change during the period between entry and 1980. (The larger share change during the earlier period is accounted for partially by the fact that the de novo operations begun before 1980 started from a zero base.) New York City banks lost share in eight instances during the 1980–1983 period, compared with the entry-1980 period when only one New York City bank lost share in an upstate market.

Thus, there is no evidence that the phased removal of deposit interest ceilings and the introduction of MMDA and Super NOW accounts has improved large New York banks' ability to gain market share from smaller upstate banks. If anything, more losses in market share during the 1980–1983 period might indicate the opposite.

The big banks' individual shares remained small at mid-1983, averaging just 3.64 percent. The average deposit size of their operations was $55 million. Acquired banks gained an average of 2.0 percentage points over the whole entry-1983 period. About two-thirds of that gain had occurred by 1980.

Large New York City banks' combined market shares have climbed since their entry into upstate markets, but they remain fairly small. The gains occurred primarily during the entry-1980 period when de novo operations accounted for most increases in market share. At entry, the large banks combined acquired an average market share of 3 percentage points in upstate markets. Their average combined share had risen sharply to 7.4 percentage points by mid-1980. It increased moderately by mid-1983, going to 9.9 percent.

SUMMARY

The continuing evidence from upstate New York seems to contradict the premise that allowing greater latitude for deposit competition increases large banks' ability to compete for deposits more than it improves small banks' competitiveness. This evidence also indicates that the large banks have not demonstrated substantial advantages over smaller upstate banks since they entered upstate metropolitan markets in the early 1970s. Deposit interest deregulation has continued since mid-1983; however, by that time some 55 percent of the nation's total bank deposits were free from interest rate regulation. Any change in large banks' competitive advantage should be noticeable in their relative performance.

The new evidence from northern New York remains quite consistent with the bulk of past evidence on both economies of scale and market performance and casts further doubt on the fabled advantage of large banks in producing and marketing basic financial services. Large banks have some advantages or they would not exist. But these advantages presently appear to be irrelevant in attracting the loan and deposit business of individuals and smaller business customers—the bread and butter of smaller banks.

COHA ASSESSMENT OF GAO REPORT ON U.S. ASSISTANCE TO HAITI

HON. WALTER E. FAUNTROY

OF THE DISTICT OF COLUMBIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, at my request the U.S. General Accounting Office has investigated and written a report on the status of economic assistance programs being implemented in Haiti by the Agency for International Development. Haiti, the poorest nation in the hemisphere, received $45 million in development assistance last year from AID, and the GAO report details how this money is being spent.

Jon Crystal, a research associate at the Council on Hemispheric Affairs, has written an analysis of this report in which he focuses on some of the problems AID faces in its efforts. He also discusses the significance of the new emphasis on using private organizations to implement development programs. I urge each of my colleagues to read Mr. Crystal's informative piece.

AN ANALYSIS OF THE GAO REPORT ON U.S. ASSISTANCE TO HAITI

(By Jon Crystal)

In a report released last month, the U.S. General Accounting Office (GAO) has given a painstakingly detailed summary of the United States' development assistance to Haiti and the effects such aid has had in recent years. The substitute of the report aptly sums up the conclusion that the Office reaches: "Progress Made, Challenges Remain." While the new emphasis on the work of U.S. and local private Non-Government Organizations (NGO's) in the country seems to have generated much optimism, it is still questionable whether this will overcome the obstacles to long-term success in the development field that have long existed and stem in part from the intrinsic shortcomings of the Haitian government.

To be sure, the task facing any development effort in the country is a formidable one, with the statistics speaking for themselves. Haiti's per capita income, the lowest in the hemisphere, is $300. There is one doctor for every 11,000 people and ⅓ of all Haitian children die before the age of five. Mountains cover 80 percent of the land, with much of the population crammed into urban slum areas. Officials from the Agency for International Development (AID)—the body that administers U.S. economic aid—has labeled past development ventures a "fiasco," including their own. An earlier GAO report produced in 1982 concluded, "Project results are generally unsatisfactory."

Many of the children that plagued earlier AID efforts remain today and chief among them is the government of Haitian president-for-life Jean-Claude ("Baby Doc") Duvalier. According to the recent report, AID officials attribute the government's "shortcomings" to "institutional weaknesses and poor economic and administrative policies." Put more bluntly, the massive corruption and inefficiency of the government bureaucracy has stymied development agencies in their struggle against widespread poverty.

The result has been twofolds: a negative international image for the country that dissuades investors from taking advantage of the rock bottom wages and more importantly, an inability of the Haitian government to assume the increasing costs and responsibilities of operating and maintaining finished development projects. The GAO report stresses that the recurrent cost problem—"a major constraint to an effective long-term rural development strategy"—is one which must be resolved by AID officials and the Haitian government. Donor's taking over the financing of such operations only delay the government in finding a permanent solution and fosters further dependence by cabinet ministries on foreign guidance and resources.

While the GAO report implies that Haitian cooperation is solving these dilemmas is "generally improving," certain inflexible constraints limit the amount of possible progress. A scarcity of financial resources and an I.M.F.-induced austerity program have acted as brakes on development, while on the political side, the Duvalier government fears that quick change will threaten the stability of the dictatorship. Were Baby Doc to disappear tomorrow, however, Haiti's economic woes would still remain; there are fundamental factors such as overpopulation, deforestation, and natural resource depletion that exist.

Nonetheless, AID officials have from past experiences recognized the difficulty of working with the Haitian authorities. Beyond this, AID has begun to circumvent the state apparatus altogether by following a new Caribbean Basin Initiative (CBI)-inspired policy of encouraging investment through the private sector. In the past year, for instance, AID has channeled nearly half of its $45 million total assistance through over 300 foreign and Haitian NGO's among which CARE and Catholic Relief Services are the largest. Officials enthusiastically assert that the NGO's can "effectively reach Haiti's poor, achieve quick program results . . . and fill voids in regions where little assistance is available." For example, an association of private health care providers has brought medical services to many rural areas hitherto not previously served by the government's clinic and hospital delivery system. Local organizations are also becoming involved in the implementation of ongoing NGO projects.

Problems have arisen however from this private sector strategy of assistance. It is difficult to coordinate so many organizations or indeed even to compile data on how many NGO's are operating in Haiti and what the focus of their activities are. Increased strains have been put on limited AID mission staff in the form of paperwork, monitoring progress, etc.

But what bothers many about the new strategy goes much deeper. On the one hand, World Bank officials have voiced concerns that this emphasis on NGO's may detract from efforts to strengthen government institutions. It is almost as though AID has given up on the possibility of the Haitian state ever achieving the ability to carry out development efforts on its own.

Similarly, the stress on developing the Haitian private sector contained both in the CBI and the AID strategy raises basic questions of development models. An AID document raises the possibility of Haiti as the "Taiwan of the Caribbean," and states, "what this implies is a more open Haitian economy, with greater potential for export of manufactured and processed agricultural products, but with a sharply growing need to import grain and consumer products." The provisions of the CBI and the proximity of the US market almost has to point Haiti in the direction of greater dependence on Washington. The question remains whether this path will lead to the future modernization of Haiti and the beginning of the end of its hunger, poverty, and despair on the one hand, and human rights violations, corruption and favoritism on the other. Indeed the GAO report itself asserts that Haiti's problems can only be solved through "a long-term sustained effort to encourage policies and institutions that strengthen development."

Progress thus far, while it has occurred, has and will be painfully slow. The report concludes that AID should continue its oversight and assistance to small community-implemented projects and food assistance programs while at the same time working with the Haitian authorities on how to meet the recurrent cost problem. The emphasis then belongs on the title of the report's second part: "Challenges remain"—an extreme understatement to say the least.●

SUCCESSFUL TAX BREAK AT RISK

HON. JAIME B. FUSTER

OF PUERTO RICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. FUSTER. Mr. Speaker, someone who knows the Caribbean well and who is thoroughly familiar with the important role Puerto Rico can play in the region calls attention to the fact that the proposed repeal of section 936 of the IRS Code can "reverse the Caribbean's present wholesome trend to democracy."

Georgie Anne Geyer, distinguished columnist and Latin American scholar, underscores some of the grave and adverse consequences the proposal could have not only on Puerto Rico but the other islands. Her July 24, 1985, article in the Washington Times provides good advice: * * * "we cannot afford to throw away any of the few tools that really work."

I request that the entire article be inserted in the RECORD so that my colleagues can have the opportunity of reading it and, perhaps, follow her sound advice.

[From the Washington Times, July 24, 1985]

SUCCESSFUL TAX BREAK AT RISK

(By Georgie Anne Geyer)

Every once in a while, from one of the bowels of bureaucracy in Washington, an idea emerges that is so utterly stupid, so cockamamie, and so self-destructively shortsighted that one wants to howl with a banshee's rage.

This time the culprit is the U.S. Treasury Department. Ostensibly, it is working at revamping the nation's tax system. In reality, what it is proposing—and what a diverted Congress may pass—is a "reform" that might well go so far as to reverse the Caribbean's present wholesome trend to democracy.

The Treasury Department has fixed its eagle eye on an obscure part of the Internal Revenue Code: Section 936. Adopted fully in 1976, this section of the code by itself has practically brought an enviable and symbolic development to the island of Puerto Rico in its unique and important commonwealth arrangement with the U.S. mainland.

The section, quite simply, provides that U.S. corporations settling in Puerto Rico need not pay federal taxes on Puerto Rican earnings. They can return those earnings to the mainland, tax-free. This had meant that this provision, alone, has generated at least 150,000 jobs and an annual payroll of $1.8 billion.

Now, this Puerto Rican-American mainland "experiment," which has been thriving since World War II (before which an impoverished Puerto Rico was only an object of pity throughout the Caribbean), is not just another "arrangement." It has been, for 40 years, the living proof that the United States could hammer out original relationships with developing areas and peoples.

Cuban President Fidel Castro and others within the Eastern bloc have consistently brought the Puerto Rico case up in the U.N.

Decolonialization Committee, trying to destroy the unique relationship. Only in the last two years has that attempt been given up—by them. Apparently, the Treasury Department and some U.S. congressmen have decided to take up where the Eastern bloc left off.

Testifying before Congress in mid-July, Puerto Rican Gov. Rafael Hernandez, who is having enough problems with 20 percent unemployment, said: "The proposal . . . would destabilize our entire economy, throw thousands out of work and force many to flee to the mainland in search of jobs. It would not increase U.S. tax revenues but would instead cost the U.S more money in terms of higher unemployment in Puerto Rico."

But, the proposal does not end with, in effect, destroying the Puerto Rican economy and the island's precarious social sanity. Gov. Hernandez, one of the finest leaders in the Caribbean, has been proposing—and very rapidly working out—a remarkable new investment program, which would extend some of the Puerto Rican solutions to the other economically troubled Caribbean and Central American states.

The governor recently proposed a plan, which would complement in the most direct manner President Reagan's Caribbean Basin Initiative, to establish "twin plants" in the basin. Plants established in Puerto Rico would be "twinned" with plants in the other countries, using the appropriate skilled or unskilled labor the circumstances dictate.

The program has been widely applauded by Caribbean leaders. In congressional testimony, Frederick Brooks of the important Caribbean Central American Action organization put it bluntly: "In the Caribbean Basin, we don't have the luxury of waiting. The CBI contemplated the immediate start-up of new investment, so that economic results would be visible while moderate leaders still have the confidence of their people."

The amazing thing is that the twin-plants idea is not just an idea.

It would be put into practice immediately in the most sensitive areas, where investment is crucial. Johnson & Johnson has announced it would build the first of the proposed plants in Grenada in 120 days.

If Section 936 is eliminated, this hope for the Caribbean goes down the drain as well.

George Fauriol, senior fellow at the Georgetown University's Center for Strategic and International Studies, said recently: "The health of the U.S.-Puerto Rican relationship may ultimately be the cornerstone of stability and progress in the Caribbean Basin region. . . . The island's democratic institutions and free-market system reinforce the regional sense of commitment against radicalism and authoritarianism."

And as Mr. Brooks summed up: "The loss would be tragic not only for Puerto Rico, but for the other islands which need these investments so badly.

"We don't have much time, and we can't afford to throw away any of the few tools that really work."●

RESOLUTION SUPPORTING NATIONAL GLEANING EFFORTS

HON. TONY P. HALL

OF OHIO

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, today I have the privilege of introducing a resolution commending gleaning groups throughout the country and those food producers—individuals and organizations—who permit gleaners to collect unharvested crops from their fields to help feed the poor of this Nation. Gleaning is a cooperative effort between growers of commodities and church and other nonprofit organizations which allows gleaners to harvest food left in the field and distribute them to programs which provide food to needy individuals.

I am pleased to say that an identical resolution is being introduced today by Senator PAUL S. TRIBLE.

Gleaning is not a new form of food contribution. Rather, it is both an idea and an action that has been with us for centuries. The support of gleaning to supply food to the poor is part of the Judeo-Christian heritage as set out in the book of Leviticus:

When you reap the harvest of your land, do not reap to the very edges of your field or gather the gleanings of your harvest. Do not go over your vineyard a second time or pick up the grapes that have fallen. Leave them for the poor and the alien.

This Nation is now experiencing a poverty rate that is higher than any we have faced over the last 15 years. Because we know that poverty is inextricably linked to hunger, we know that a great number of our citizens are living without sufficient resources to assure adequate nutrition for themselves and their families.

Many private nonprofit organizations such as the Society of St. Andrew in Virginia, Sparrow Outreach ministries in Washington State, and gleaners statewise in California are providing food to the needy through food pantries, food banks, and soup kitchens. For many, these food outlets may be their sole source of food. The public is generally aware of the food contributions made by grocery stores, produce markets, and food processors. However, I have found that few people are informed about the contributions made by gleaners. The donations of food producers and the efforts of gleaning organizations supply a great deal of the food available to the needy through food assistance outlets.

Across this Nation farmers are opening their fields to gleaners who channel the "fruits of their labor" to charitable organizations for distribution to the poor. Some States have enacted tax policies and good Samaritan laws to create incentives for gleaning activities. Many States are reviewing their legislation in this area. The resolution I am submitting today encourages State governments to invest in more incentives to increase the number of food producers who permit gleaning of their fields and the number of shippers who donate, or charge reduced rates for, transport services for gleaned produce.

In 1977, the General Accounting Office conducted a study of food loss during the 1974 crop year. It found that an estimated 49 million people could have been fed from the nearly 60 million tons of grain, fruit, and vegetables not harvested. This report to Congress confirms something that we already know: "food loss represents a missed opportunity to feed the hungry." With the growing rate of hunger in this country, we cannot afford to let these opportunities slip by.

I hope that my colleagues will join me in sponsoring this legislation. The text of my resolution follows:

H. CON. RES. —

Whereas a large number of people in this country are not able to regularly supply themselves and their families with food;

Whereas food banks, soup kitchens, and other emergency food providers are witnessing a substantial increase in the number of persons seeking food assistance;

Whereas gleaning is a partnership between food producers and nonprofit organizations through which food producers permit members of such organizations to collect grain, vegetables, and fruit which have not been harvested and distribute such food items to programs which provide food to needy individuals;

Whereas support of gleaning to supply food to the poor is part of the Judeo-Christian heritage as set out in the Book of Leviticus, "When you reap the harvests of your land, do not reap to the very edges of your field or gather the gleanings of your harvest. Do not go over your vineyard a second time or pick up the grapes that have fallen. Leave them for the poor and the alien.";

Whereas a 1977 General Accounting Office analysis estimated that during the 1974 harvest 60,000,000 tons of grain, vegetables, and fruit, valued at $5,000,000,000 were unharvested;

Whereas the diets of millions of hungry people in the United States could have been supplemented with such lost grain, vegetables, and fruit;

Whereas a number of State and local governments have enacted Good Samaritan laws which limit the liability of food donors and provide an incentive for food contributions; and

Whereas numerous civic, religious, charitable, and other nonprofit organizations throughout the country have begun gleaning programs to harvest such food items and channel them to the hungry in the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that—

(1) food producers who permit gleaning of their fields and civic, religious, charitable, and other nonprofit organizations which glean fields and distribute the resulting harvest to help alleviate hunger should be commended for their efforts; and

(2) State and local governments should be encouraged to enact tax and other incentives designed to increase the number of food producers who permit gleaning of their fields and the number of shippers who donate, or charge reduced rates for, transportation of gleaned produce.●

THE 20TH ANNIVERSARY OF MEDICARE AND MEDICAID

HON. OLYMPIA J. SNOWE

OF MAINE

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 20th anniversary of the birth of the Medicare and Medicaid Programs. Programs, like people, grow over the years so that each birthday marks another milestone along the path toward maturity. In the case of these two programs, much has been learned and changed, but much more can be done in the future.

Let us, just for a moment, go back to 1965. It was a time of economic expansion and a belief in abundance. It was in this environment that Medicare and Medicaid were created in order to protect those who were most in need of help: the elderly and the poor.

Now, 20 years later, Medicare insures 95 percent of all older persons, regardless of their income or their assets. Medicaid provides medical assistance for those with low incomes and for the bulk of nursing home care. Without these programs, the elderly and indigent would be at risk of catastrophic illness; many would not be able to seek adequate care.

But that is not to say that all the battles have been fought. In fact, like the maturing programs that they are, Medicare and Medicaid represent only a beginning. There is much left to be done. The elderly are paying large sums of money for out-of-pocket care under Medicare—over $1,500 per person. That must be remedied. The cost of medicine and prosthetic devices are not included under Medicare and therefore create a financial hardship for the elderly. That must be remedied. There is not a coordinated, comprehensive system of long-term care. That must be remedied.

In 15 short years, this Nation will enter the 21st century. We will face challenges that we can not begin to imagine. As we celebrate this important day, we should remember that we are celebrating an idea that, like all ideas, is only limited by our imagination.●

HELPING THE LEARNING DISABLED

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, I am extremely fortunate to represent the P'tach organization which is fast establishing a national reputation for education excellence.

P'tach [Parents for Torah for All Children] is an organization that establishes special education programs for learning disabled Jewish students in Yeshivot and day schools around the country.

Learning disabled children are prefectly capable of succeeding in the academic community, yet they require personal attention to maximize their potential. P'tach programs provide this individualized academic remediation and support services to enable these youngsters to remain in the mainstream of their Yeshiva.

P'tach graduates have pursued higher education and a variety of careers becoming productive members of the Jewish community and society at large.

Today there are 16 P'tach programs in operation in elementary and high school level Yeshivot serving over 400 children in the New York area alone. The cost to support these programs is enormous, averaging $10,000 per student per year, far more than most parents can afford to pay. P'tach must rely heavily on private donations in order to keep these vital programs afloat.

For hundreds of learning disabled Jewish children, P'tach opens the door to a brighter, more promising future.

I would like to place in the RECORD an article that recently appeared in the New York Times about the fine work of P'tach. I'm sure my colleagues will enjoy and appreciate reading about this first-rate educational institution.

LEARNING DISABLED FIND EXTRA HELP AT YESHIVAS

(By Ari L. Goldman)

No matter how hard he tried, Daniel Plaut kept losing his place in the page of the Talmud that was spread out before him.

He lived in fear that his "rebbe," the rabbi who taught the class, would call on him and find out he was not following.

That was before Daniel, a brighteyed and articulate 17-year-old, was diagnosed as having a motor coordination problem that made following any printed text—let alone the small type on the page of a Talmud—virtually impossible without special help.

The evaluation also helped explain why he did poorly in the classes in secular studies at the Brooklyn yeshiva he attended.

A YEAR IN ISRAEL

Since the diagnosis five years ago, Daniel has been attending the country's first program in a yeshiva setting for youngsters with learning disabilities. Later this month he will graduate from high school, and he plans to spend a year in Israel working on a kibbutz before entering the College of Staten Island of the City University.

"I'm far from planning to become a rabbi," said Daniel, who wears a knit yarmulke over his dark wavy hair. "But I do plan to live the life of a religious Jew."

Daniel is one of 600 youngsters enrolled in a program called P'tach, which stands for Parents for Torah for All Children. P'tach chapters operate within established Jewish day schools, known as yeshivas, in New York, Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Los Angeles and Oak Park, Mich.

The program, which operates as an independent unit within a yeshiva, has its own teachers and own budget. As part of the arrangement with the yeshiva, P'tach students can participate in regular classes when they are able to keep up.

"What the public schools did 10 or 15 years ago, the yeshivas are dealing with now," said Joel Dickstein, the coordinator of P'tach at Yeshiva University High School in Manhattan, where Daniel is a senior. In 1975, Congress passed the Education of All Handicapped Children Act, under which public schools are required to provide services for handicapped youngsters, including the learning disabled.

IN THE BACK OF THE ROOM

The law, however, does not apply to the privately run yeshivas, which stress familiarity with the Talmud, the Jewish library of law and tradition, as well as academic excellence in secular subjects. "These are the kids that sat in the back of the room," Mr. Dickstein said. "They were not diagnosed in elementary school, so either they would get pushed ahead or they would get pushed out and go to public school."

In the public schools the learning-disabled youngsters would often get the special attention they required but would not get the Jewish learning—Hebrew, Bible, Talmud and Jewish history, laws and customs—that they needed to be part of the religious Jewish community.

At the P'tach program at the Manhattan yeshiva high school the other day, Rabbi Yehoshua Fulda was teaching the Bible to a class of six boys. Although all followed the same text from Numbers, what was going on was really six different classes. One youngster was learning Hebrew penmanship, another Jewish laws and another reading.

For half the period, the class examined the text together; during the second half each child concentrated on an individual assignment. Rabbi Fulda, who has a master's degree in special education, went from youngster to youngster, offering guidance and encouragement.

PURELY PHONETIC

Rabbi Fulda said, however, that Hebrew can actually be a help to a child with a learning problem. "Hebrew is purely phonetic while English is not," he said. "If you learn the rules, you can deal with dyslexia better."

In the secular studies program at the Manhattan school, the P'tach students have small classes with time for concentration on individual lessons. In both the religious and secular classes the goal is to integrate the youngsters into the regular classes at the high school. Most of the P'tach youngsters take at least some classes with the regular high school students.

The P'tach program, with its 48 boys at the school, has added something new to the high school of 500. The school never had a shop for woodworking or stained glass until the P'tach program was established.

Daniel Plaut, who went from being a child with difficulty reading to a young man ready for college, said he still looked forward to shop each week. "When I came to school here, I felt like a low-life, a degenerate," he said. "That is what they taught me in elementary school. What they taught me here is a sense of self-esteem, a sense of value."

Five of the eight P'tach youngsters graduating this month will go on to college and three to vocational school. In addition to college programs, previous graduates have gone on to work in business, computers, jewelry and appliance repair.

P'tach was started in 1976 by a small group of parents of children with learning disabilities who felt that their youngsters were not being appropriately educated in Jewish day schools. The organization began as a support and advocacy group that hoped to convince the yeshivas to begin their own special education programs.

After getting encouragement but little action, P'tach decided to go into the education business itself, hiring educators and renting space from the yeshivas. In 1979, it opened its first program, with 13 students at the Manhattan yeshiva high school. There are now 600 students—400 of them in New York and New Jersey—in P'tach programs in 13 yeshiva elementary schools and 3 yeshiva high schools.

P'tach objective, its organizers say, is to turn the responsibility back to the Jewish day schools.

"Our goal is to go out of business," said Rabbi Burton Jaffa, the national director of P'tach, "and we will go out of business when every yeshiva recognizes that they have an obligation to these children."●

NATIONAL WATERMELON DAY

HON. WILLIAM W. COBEY, JR.

OF NORTH CAROLINA

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. COBEY. Mr. Speaker, today I had the privilege of hosting the "Great Watermelon Feast" on the east lawn of the Capitol Grounds. At the event, Secretary of Agriculture John Block proclaimed today "National Watermelon Day."

This ceremony was held to reassure the American people that watermelons are safe to eat. Recently, watermelons from several fields in California were found to be tainted with the pesticide Aldicarb. When news of the tainted fruit was broadcast by the news media, many Americans across the country stopped buying watermelons.

National watermelon sales have dropped an average of 30 to 35 percent. In my own State of North Carolina, watermelon sales have dropped an average of 40 percent, with some areas in the State seeing a 50 percent decrease.

I hope the "Great Watermelon Feast" we held today will reassure the American people. California watermelons are now safe to eat, as all the watermelon-producing fields there have been checked for traces of the pesticide. Watermelons from other States, of course, have always been safe.

I trust that the word will go out that Americans should enjoy the summer and eat plenty of watermelon during the hot days ahead. People who buy watermelons from their local grocer or at farmers markets such as the Farmers Market in Raleigh, NC, which is part of the congressional district I represent, can be certain now that watermelons are safe.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the National Watermelon Association for helping my staff organize today's event. Thanks also to Mr. DE LA GARZA, chairman of the House Agriculture Committee, Senator HELMS, the chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee, the National Watermelon Queen, Shani Radney, and the North Carolina Watermelon Queen, Lynn Shirley, for joining us at this event.

And most of all, thanks to the farmers who work so hard to provide us with this high quality fruit.●

SHUTTING IN OIL, AGAIN

HON. WILLIAM E. DANNEMEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, earlier this month the Secretary of the Interior took it upon himself to reach what has been described as a "preliminary" agreement with certain members of the congressional delegation from California on Outer Continental Shelf [OCS] energy development.

As a long-time advocate of increased U.S. energy efforts to offset oil imports and their negative impact on our balance of trade, I was distressed upon learning of the announcement. Subsequent meetings and a review of the agreement's details, including a meeting with Secretary Hodel, did nothing to dissuade me from the view that the agreement is not in our national interest.

While I will be speaking out in considerable detail on this issue, at this time I wanted to share with my colleagues an editorial from last Friday's Wall Street Journal which succinctly outlines the key objections to the proposal.

I ask permission to insert it at this point in the RECORD:

[From the Wall Street Journal, July 26, 1985]

SHUTTING IN OIL, AGAIN

Back in 1979, when American motorists were waiting in long gasoline lines, we were amazed to learn of "shut-in" oil wells in California. Federal regulations, it turned out, were the culprits. Price controls made it uneconomical to pump oil out of numerous existing wells, and allocation restrictions exacerbated the problems of the gas stations.

As one of his first acts as president, Ronald Reagan eliminated those federal controls in January 1981. Since then, of course, gas lines have vanished, supplies have grown, prices have fallen and OPEC is singing its swan song. Now, however, the Reagan administration plans to shut-in oil in California once more. Interior Secretary Donald Hodel last week reached a "preliminary" agreement with a California congressional delegation to sharply restrict oil and gas development off most of California's coast through 1999.

For the past four years Congress has passed, with ever slimmer majorities, annual moratoriums on the further exploration and development of California's offshore energy riches. Indeed, this area is considered the most promising of all the nation's waters in terms of oil and gas potential. This year, the effort to extend the moratorium seemed destined for defeat in a crucial House committee vote. A desperate delegation of Californians from Capitol Hill—mostly Democrats, but also including two Republicans, Sen. Pete Wilson and Rep. Bill Lowery—turned to Secretary Hodel for a bailout. They got it, at least tentatively.

Mr. Hodel agreed to offer for federal leasing a mere 150 of the 6,460 offshore tracts that Congress has so far withheld from development. The Hodel "compromise" would open up only 2.3% of the acreage. Moreover, instead of the year-to-year congressional bans, the Hodel pact would last until the end of the century, barring some undefined "national emergency."

Environmentalists were overjoyed. The Natural Resources Defense Council, longtime obstructionists of energy development, called Mr. Hodel's concessions a "breakthrough." The oil and gas industries were less sanguine. The specific tracts offered by Mr. Hodel were variously called "dogs," "junk", or "trash" by energy experts familiar with the geology of these areas. California Gov. George Deukmejian, too, was not pleased. As a historic opponent of "blanket moratoriums," Mr. Deukmejian clearly sees the benefits of offshore exploration, while still guarding the most sensitive sections of California's coastline. But the governor, like the energy industry, was not consulted prior to Mr. Hodel's decision. The word in Sacramento is that the interior secretary "paid a heavy price" to satisfy the demands of California's environmentalists lobby.

Already under the Reagan administration, with the prodding of Congress, federal bans on offshore drilling have expanded, unfathomably, from 700,000 acres in 1982 to 45 million acres today. In order for the U.S. to maintain present levels of oil and gas production at reasonable prices, reserves will have to be continually replaced with a high rate of new discoveries. The American Petroleum Institute estimates that between now and the year 2000 the U.S. will need to find more than 180% of its current proven reserves.

No such requisite amount of exploration is going to take place if federal authorities again shut in oil in California or elsewhere in the U.S. The only "emergency" that the Interior Department should be planning for is the one preordained by Mr. Hodel's offshore decision.●

TIME FOR THE SOVIETS TO PERMIT SOVIET JEWS TO EMIGRATE

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of this measure, Senate Joint Resolution 161, which I believe is both timely and compassionate. It seeks to support the case of individuals who suffer much through the refusal of the Soviet Government to permit their orderly emigration. It focuses on famed physicist Anatoly Shcharansky, who has won the hearts and admiration of the civilized world with his devotion to the cause of freedom. Shcharansky has protested in the last way available to him, by a hunger strike, while exiled internally in the Soviet Union. His valiant and devoted wife Avital, who herself had a difficult time leaving the Soviet Union, testified just yesterday before the House Foreign Affairs Committee, explaining how the Soviet Union seeks to exploit her husband.

It addresses the situation of all Soviet Jews, who face truncated opportunity within the Soviet Union, and limited chances to leave that country. As these courageous individuals have encountered Soviet discrimination, they have become activists on behalf of their coreligionists, with the result that they face persecution and terrible treatment at the hands of the Soviet State. Vladimir and Maria Slepak, Ida Nudel, Yosef Begun, and Vladimir Felstman, are just a few of the thousands who face Soviet heavyhandedness. We encourage the Soviet Union to respond to this appeal on behalf of Soviet Jewry and grant freedom to emigrate to Anatoly Shcharansky and all the others who have sought to exercise human rights subscribed to by the Soviet Union in the Helsinki accords. The 10th anniversary of the signing of those accords comes up in just a few days. What a wonderful celebration it would be of that anniversary if Anatoly Shcharansky and so many others were to be released from their various prisons and allowed to emigrate.

Thank you Mr. Speaker. I commend my colleagues in the House of Representatives and the Senate for their favorable action on Senate Resolution 161, and support it vigorously.●

IMPORTANT BANKING LEGISLATION

HON. CARROLL HUBBARD, JR.

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, I received an excellent July 5, 1985, letter from Mr. Ted Bradshaw, director of government relations of the Kentucky Bankers Association in Louisville, KY.

I believe my colleagues will be interested in Ted Bradshaw's comments to me about two important banking measures which have been reported to the full House by our Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs. Upon reading his concerns, I am certain my colleagues will remember his support of closing the nonbank bank loophole (as embodied in H.R. 20, the Financial Institutions Equity Act of 1985) and his opposition to certain provisions of H.R. 2707, the Depository Institutions Acquisition Act of 1985, particularly those which override States' rights.

The letter to me from Ted Bradshaw follows:

JULY 5, 1985.

Hon. CARROLL HUBBARD, Jr.
2182 Rayburn Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CARROLL: Sometime within the next few weeks the House will take under consideration financial services legislation embodied in two bills reported by the House Banking Committee on June 12, 1985. H.R. 20, Financial Institutions Equity Act of 1985, would close the nonbank bank loophole while H.R. 2707, Depository Institutions Acquisitions Act of 1985, would authorize regional compacts with a state opt-out and a mandatory five year trigger for full nationwide interstate banking.

While none of these issues has been presented to the full membership of the Kentucky Bankers Association, my conversations with individual bankers across the state indicate a desire to see the loophole closed and the need to be able to offer additional services to their customers on a competitive basis. Most would prefer to see the loophole closed as of July, 1983 without grandfathering any nonbank banks but that date appears to be unattainable.

H.R. 2707, Depository Institutions Acquisitions Act, seems, to me, to be superfluous in that it authorizes interstate compacts which have been upheld by an 8-0 vote of the Supreme Court. The five ear "trigger" in this legislation is an "end run" by the big New York and California banks to get around the Supreme Court decision. The 1990 "trigger" does not make that much difference in Kentucky since we are one of only three states that has a national "trigger" that becomes effective in 1986. However, Kentucky made the decision on nationwide interstate banking at the state level which is where the decision should be made. Not mandated by Congress!

The real problem with H.R. 2707 is that the so called "opt-out provision" does not give a state that desires to participate in a regional interstate banking compact but not nationwide interstate banking any option. If a state remains a participant in a regional compact, H.R. 2707 requires that state to open its borders to nationwide banking in 1990. The effect of this provision is to take away the authority of the individual states to determine the banking structure under which they want to operate and will cause the formation of regional interstate compacts to cease.

I would certainly hope that Congress will act responsibly and close the nonbank loophole, authorize some expanded services for banks in order that they may compete and allow the states to determine the banking structure in each state.

Sincerely,

TED BRADSHAW,
Director of Government Relations,
Kentucky Bankers Association.●

DR. THOMAS D. STAPLETON RECEIVES PRESIDENT'S CITIZENSHIP AWARD

HON. FRANK HORTON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I am very proud to enter into the official RECORD of the U.S. Congress information about an award that was made to one of my constituents, Dr. Thomas D. Stapleton. Dr. Stapleton recently received the President's Citizenship Award from the Medical Society of the State of New York. Society president Dr. Allison B. Landolt presented the award during the June annual meeting of the organization's house of delegates in New York City.

Dr. Stapleton is a native of Auburn, NY, which is located in my congressional district. He is a graduate of Georgetown University Medical School. In addition, he received further training at Brooklyn Eye and Ear Hospital and the New York Eye Infirmary.

A Navy physician with the 4th Marine Division in World War II, he participated in invasions of the Marshall Islands, Saipan-Tinian, and Iwo Jima, receiving four battle stars, a Presidential Unit Citation, a Bronze Star, and a Navy Commendation Medal.

Serving his community, Dr. Stapleton helped organize the city's community-owned nonprofit baseball club in 1958 and served as vice president, president, and chairman of the New York-Penn League Auburn team.

He was appointed to the board of trustees of Auburn Community College in 1958, reappointed in 1961, and served as vice chairman from 1965 to 1975. Honored with the Most Outstanding Citizen of the Year Award by the Auburn Lion's Club in 1969, Dr. Stapleton also won the Monsignor Straub Memorial Trophy as Sportsman of the Year in 1974, and was named Man of the Year by the Holy Family Athletic Association in 1980.

In 1984, the physician was appointed to the mayor's advisory committee for Operation Auburn.

Mr. Speaker, I congratulate Dr. Stapleton on his outstanding work and am pleased to share his accomplishments with my colleagues.●

LOW-POWER TELEVISION AND COPYRIGHT

HON. ROBERT W. KASTENMEIER

OF WISCONSIN

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation, with a respected member of my subcommittee [Mr. BOUCHER], to cure a problem in current copyright law. The problem involves low-power television, a new service authorized in 1982 by the Federal Communications Commission, which is designed to provide local television service in markets underserved by conventional television. Ultimately such low-power television could serve communities much as local radio stations serve such communities today.

However, current copyright law creates confusion with regard to transmitting local low-power television station signals via cable because the law can be construed as defining such signals as "distant signals" under copyright, subjecting them to royalty fees and limiting the ability of such low-revenue stations to provide television service.

When I learned of the problem in October 1984, I contacted my counterpart chairman on the Senate, Senator CHARLES MCC. MATHIAS, Jr., and together we wrote to the then Register of Copyrights, David Ladd, asking that administrative action be taken to resolve the problem since Congress was scheduled to adjourn within days.

In our letter, we noted that under the potential interpretation of the law, "cable systems would be very reluctant to include low power stations within their complement of local services on a 'may-carry' basis, which in turn would seriously damage the development or viability of low power television."

The letter further noted that, practically speaking, a low power television signal is not powerful enough to be designated a "distant signal" since its maximum range is only 10 to 20 miles.

The Copyright Office responded by expeditiously holding a public hearing on the matter; the Office determined that it would henceforth abide by the determination of a cable system as to whether or not a low-power television signal carried by that cable system is a local signal and therefore exempt for the royalty fee. By way of a letter from General Counsel Dorothy Schraeder, the Office expressly stated:

That the status of low power television signals under the cable compulsory license is ambiguous. Accordingly, in examining cable Statements of Account, the Copyright Office will not question the determination by a cable system that a low power station's signal is "local" within an area approximating the normal coverage zone of such station.

The Copyright Office further expressed its support for legislative clarifications of the statutory ambiguity by a technical amendment to the Copyright Act.

The legislation we are introducing today accomplishes that objective. The bill is in the nature of a technical amendment to section 111(f) to clarify that subsection's definition of "local service area of a primary transmitter" as applied to low power television.

The existing statutory definition of the "local service area of a primary transmitter" covers those broadcast services in existence in 1976, full-owner domestic TV stations, Canadian and Mexican stations, and radio stations. Because all full power domestic stations were subject to the mandatory carriage rules, Congress defined the area of local service for copyright purposes in terms of the must carry area specified in FCC rules. Parenthetically, today's legislation is not affected by the finding of the D.C. Circuit that present must-carry rules are unconstitutional as violative of the first amendment. See Quincy against Federal Communications Commission.

Because low power television stations did not exist in 1976 and are not subject to mandatory carriage at all, current law needs to be clarified to insure that low power stations are treated in the same manner as full-power domestic and Canadian and Mexican signals with respect to when carriage of those signals will be "local" and royalty-free and when they will be "distant." Because of confusion created by the current definition not specifically defining an area with respect to new low power service, there is considerable reluctance on the part of cable systems to carry the programing of LPTV stations and risk copyright liablity. The net result is that audiences, especially in rural areas, are deprived of local programming offered by these stations. Moreover, low power licensees are insulated from a growing proportion of the public they were licensed to serve, with devastating effects on the pool of programming available to low power stations and the economic viability of this fledgling broadcast service.

The proposed legislation modifies section 111(f) to define specifically the "local service area" of low power television station in a manner such that cable systems will know with precision when their carriage of such a station is "local" and when it is "distant." For low power stations located outside the 50 metropolitan statistical areas with the largest populations based on the 1980 census, that area would comprise a radius of 35 miles from the low-power station's transmitter site. Therefore, a cable system located within that area may carry that station's signal as a "local" signal without payment of royalties. In heavily populated areas represented by the top 50 metropolitan statistical areas, however, the area of local service would be reduced to 20 miles.

It is believed that the amendment will remove any remaining copyright ambiguities facing cable systems and enable decisions as to whether or not to carry low power stations on a local basis to be based on what is best for subscribers and the community served.

The result of this statutory clarification will be increased programming possibilities in underserved small communities, promotion of localism, the freer flow of information and ideas and more satisfied viewers.●

DREW KARPINSKI

HON. DEAN A. GALLO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to acknowledge professionalism of the highest degree. I rise to bring to the attention of all of my fellow Members of Congress the accomplishments of a constituent of mine, Mr. Drew Karpinski, of Mendham, NJ.

Earlier this month, Mr. Karpinski completed his term as president of the Professional Insurance Agents of New Jersey, and he finished with such a long list of accomplishments that his peers named him the "agent of the year." This is only the third time in the history of the organization that this award has been bestowed upon a president leaving office.

Recognition by one's peers is the highest mark of accomplishment. It is recognition by professionals who know the meaning of excellence. It is recognition by those individuals who know, from their own personal experience, just what it takes to get a job done, and, more importantly, what it takes to reach the top.

Drew Karpinski is deserving of this recognition. Because of his efforts, the Professional Insurance Agents of New Jersey have risen to new heights within their industry. Because of Drew Karpinski's vision and understanding of the changing environment within his industry, the educational programs, the membership programs, and the legislative action program of the association are now second to none.

Under Drew's leadership, the association looked not only to help itself and its own members, it also looked upon the quality of life around the association and ventured to improve that quality. The Professional Insurance Agent's involvement in the Special Olympics Program is worthy of the applause of each and every Member of Congress.

I am lucky to have a constitutent like Drew Karpinski. Having people in one's district like Drew helps to improve the district. Their enthusiam, their pride, and their abilities are contageous. Those qualities spread, and make the district a better place in which to live.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the time to acknowledge Drew Karpinski's accomplishments.●

JIM FAULK—AN INSPIRATIONAL LEADER

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, Jim Faulk, the coach, counselor, and athletic director at the St. Agnes Home for Boys in Sparkill, NY, passed away on June 19 at the age of 77.

One of his former students, James E. Merna, of Lanham, MD, is now the public affairs officer at the U.S. Department of Energy here in Washington. Mr. Merna recently had published in the Rockland County Journal News a tribute to Coach Faulk which I found so inspirational and moving that I would like to share it with my colleagues:

JIM FAULK—AN INSPIRATIONAL LEADER

(By James E. Merna)

Even though Jim Faulk left St. Agnes and Rockland County in 1959 to move to Orlando, Fla., and more recently to Chambersburg, Pa., he was never forgotten by his friends in Rockland County.

In 1978, Jim and his wife Betty, to whom he was married for 43 years, attended a banquet at the Holiday Inn in Nanuet. Jim was inducted, along with five other sports figures, into the Rockland County Sports Hall of Fame.

The program citation read: "Jim not only was the coach, he was Mr. Everything at St. Agnes. He did it all, He was the athletic director, the guidance counselor, the social worker, the disciplinarian, the trainer, the varsity and J.V. coach for all the sports, which included football, basketball, baseball, wrestling and golf. In his spare time he also ran a full sports program for the alumni. He even drove the school bus."

Jim Faulk came to St. Agnes in 1933, fresh out of the University of Alabama. Through the years, he turned down lucrative offers from Villanova, the New York Military Academy and other prestigious institutions to remain at a much lower salary with the orphans at St. Agnes. He produced football teams so tough, many agree, that few schools wanted to play him. One of the schools that accepted the challenge was St. Cecelia's High School in Englewood, N.J. Its young coach then was Vince Lombardi, who later went on to fame as head coach of the Green Bay Packers and the Washington Redskins.

Jim established a relationship with New York Military Academy, playing them in a variety of sports for a number of years only after having them first believe that St. Agnes, like NYMA, was a fancy prep school. Well, a fancy prep school we were not. St Agnes kids, for the most part, were orphans and the products of broken homes, primarily from the New York City. Most of us were sent to St. Agnes under the auspices of New York Catholic Charities.

It was at St. Agnes were Jim dedicated his life to helping needy youngsters improve their lot in life. He always said that the boys he worked with were more important to him than any records he may set. When he was elected to the Rockland County Sports Hall of Fame, he said in his acceptance speech, "I made it only because of the gutsy kids I coached at St. Agnes.

During World War II, Jim took a leave of absence from St. Agnes to join the Marines. As a Marine Corps officer, he saw extensive combat duty in the Pacific, including action at Guadalcanal. He remained in the Marine Corps Reserve in later life and retired as a full colonel.

He wrote many inspiring letter from his combat assignments during the war that were reprinted in a * * *serving in the military around the globe. In one of his letters, as he was aboard ship and waiting to go over the side, he wrote:

"There is absolutely no group of men in this wide world as loyal and devoted to its alma mater and to each other as you fighting boys from St. Agnes. No doubt, as you move from place to place in your travels to all continents and mingle with men from all states and nations, you must begin to appreciate more and more that spirit of St. Agnes—the spirit that is so much part of your daily lives.

"No one but a St. Agnes boy could understand that deep loyalty and respect you have for each other. Stick together in war as you did in peace. Let the Sisters back home know where you are and what you are doing. Whether a private or a captain, you all speak the same language; you all have the same ideals and you are all heroes in my book. The Sisters feel likewise. They are bursting with pride and joy over your accomplishments."

That's the type of man Jim Faulk was—always inspiring, encouraging and motivating St. Agnes men to excel and achieve. And many St. Agnes graduates heard his message and followed in his footsteps. Many walk taller in life today because of Jim Faulk's effort and concern. He cared like nobody cared.

Literally hundreds and hundreds of St. Agnes men, including two brothers and myself, joined the Marine Corps, inspired by the example set by Coach Faulk. He was probably the greatest unofficial recruiter the Marine Corps ever had. Continually inspired by Coach Faulk, many St. Agnes graduates have gone on to achieve great success in life. Joe Rosen, widely known as "Mr. St. Agnes Alumni Association," reports we have more than our share of doctors, lawyers, priests * * * professionals in the crafts and trades.

Jim and his wife Betty were never blessed with children of their own. But that didn't bother us. Many St. Agnes men adopted the Faulks—and they adopted us, and our children, as part of one big, happy family.

Some of us, including myself, even named our children after Coach Faulk. My eldest son, James Faulk Merna, 21, is a midshipman second class at the U.S. Naval Academy and president of the Class of 1987. Coach Faulk was very proud of his namesake, and visited him at Annapolis.

Coach Faulk once told me in a letter, while I was in Korea during that war, "One character trait that I admired in all of you St. Agnes men—you went out into the world with two strikes on you and never expected to be embraced, gave your all for your country when it asked, and, now, most of you are raising families who can truly say—my father came up the hard way."

The citizens of Rockland County honored Jim Faulk during his lifetime—and he had a deep and abiding love for them as well. This was manifested to me a few years ago when I asked Coach Faulk for a thought or two that I might be able to use in speaking to the John M. Perry American Legion Post in Sparkill. He offered the following:

"The people from Piermont, Sparkill and St. Agnes represent what this America really stands for. Their loyalty was always unquestioned, their dedication 100 percent, and they proved to be the greatest fighters in the world. Proof of their courage and sacrifice is evident in the Sparkill Square on Memorial Day where so many crosses are on display. No two towns in Rockland County together gave so many of their youths for the cause of freedom in World War II."

This was Coach Faulk—a giant among men, a stout patriot, God loving, widely respected and emulated. We cherish his memory and share in the very personal grief of his loved ones. By his personal example and lifetime of encouragement, he inspired many to greatness.

THE RETIREMENT UNIVERSAL SECURITY ARRANGEMENT ACT OF 1985

HON. MARGE ROUKEMA

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join the gentleman from Vermont, JIM JEFFORDS, in introducing the Retirement Universal Security Arrangement Act of 1985. This bipartisan legislation—nicknamed "Retirement-USA"—takes a momentous step forward in addressing one of the most serious shortcomings of our pension system today—the lack of "portability" of pension benefits from one job to another.

Earlier this year, the Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations, on which I serve as ranking Republican, conducted a series of hearings on the need for a coherent national retirement income policy. These hearings were particularly timely in that the comprehensive Federal pension law—the Employee Retirement Income Security Act [ERISA] has just completed its first decade.

If there was a single point upon which a consensus was heard it was that ERISA is working well for those employees who retire with a vested benefit which they can then receive as a "stream of income" in annuity form. But we learned that the vast majority of employees do not fall within this category.

In the first place, 48 percent of the work force is not covered by an employer-provided pension plan. This varies considerably from industry to industry with a high percentage in some, like public utilities, 93.1 percent, and a low percentage in others, such as business and personal services, 33.8 percent.

Even among those employees who are covered, the value of their pension coverage is diminished considerably by the current mobility which characterizes our labor force. Among men, the average tenure on a single job varies from 3.7 to 8 years, depending on the age group. With women, it varies from 2.3 to 3.9 years.

What does this mobility mean as far as pension benefits are concerned? In the first place, where plans adopt the minimum vesting requirement of 10 years, it means that any service for a lesser period will earn no pension benefits. Yet, even where an employee does vest, the plan frequently will "cash-out" his benefit when he leaves employment, thus allowing the funds to be used for purposes other than retirement income. Clearly, this is unfavorable both for the economy, which loses savings and capital formation, and for the individual who loses a future source of retirement income to supplement Social Security.

Even where employees are trying to provide for their retirement income through individual retirement accounts [IRA's], it is hardly a sufficient substitute since IRA's provide lumpsum benefits. This money can be used to purchase an annuity, but at a much higher rate than those paid by pension plans, which benefit from economies of scale.

At the conclusion of our hearings, it was apparent that what is clearly needed to address these deficiencies is a vehicle for employees to be able to move from one job to another with a single pension plan following that employee for the duration of his career. Mr. Speaker, that is precisely the vehicle which this bill provides.

A Retirement-USA would operate much like a statutory "prototype" defined-contribution pension plan. It would be tax qualified and would be established and maintained by a pension asset manager—bank, insurance company, mutual fund, and so forth. The investments made for the Retirement-USA account would be directed by the employee-participant, who would have to have at least three investment options available to him, one of which would have to be principally backed by Treasury obligations.

Besides offering the employers of uncovered workers a no-frills incentive to make pension contributions, Retirement-USA's would also provide another option for employers who already have a pension plan. Instead of cashing out or retaining accounts for terminated employees, an employer could transfer the cash value of vested amounts to a Retirement-USA, thus relieving the employer of the administrative burden of continuing to carry these accounts.

This bill serves a number of worthy goals: First, to preserve preretirement pension funds in the form of retirement savings for ultimate payout in annuity form to meet death, disability, and retirement needs; second, to provide voluntary pension portability for our increasingly mobile work force; and third, to improve social and tax equity for those employees not now covered under employer-sponsored plans.●

OUTER SPACE INVENTIONS ACT

HON. MANUEL LUJAN, JR.

OF NEW MEXICO

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill which is critically important to the future of space commercialization. Called the Outer Space Inventions Act, this bill, when coupled with a bill already introduced by my colleague [Mr. KASTENMEIER] which clarifies the application of U.S. patent law to outer space in general, will go a long way to creating a climate in which space commercialization can survive and even flourish in the years ahead.

Mr. Speaker, what my bill, the Outer Space Inventions Act, does is to lay some positive ground rules for intellectual property rights in space by providing that any person who makes an invention in the course of activities in outer space shall retain all patent rights to such an invention. To achieve this objective, this bill amends title 35 of the United States Code and the National Aeronautics and Space Act of 1958.

Many estimates have been made and revised on the economic impact of space commercialization to the future of our Nation. While it is not clear whether the payoff to our country will be a $50 billion a year industry by the year 2000 or a $40 billion a year industry, what is clear is that this fledgling industry will contribute substantially to our economy during the 21st century if the industry can get off the ground properly. While we in Congress have begun to examine ways in which to reduce the substantial risk of doing business in space by streamlining the regulatory process, and eliminating Government redtape in the case of commercial launch vehicles, we still haven't come up with a very good way to actively help space commercialization get off the ground. I believe that this bill is a good step in that direction.

As my colleagues know, there are some risks of doing business in space which, even if we set clear and consistent Federal space policies, we just can't do anything about. We can't for example, change gravity. We can't reduce some of the physical risks our emerging space pioneers and entrepreneurs will face living and working in zero gravity. What we can do, however, is try to make it more cost effective for companies to do business in space.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, does just that by granting the patents to any companies making discoveries in space. This legislation recognizes the importance of the profit motive to American industry and innovation, and encourages corporate America to go forth and commercialize space.

This legislation has received strong support from a variety of patent attorneys and companies. Nothing in this bill is intended to affect any pending cases.

I urge my colleagues to lend their full support to this legislation, for I believe that our future in space depends, in large part, upon the passage of initiatives just like this one.

H.R. 3112

A bill to amend title 35 of the United States Code, and the National Aeronautics and Space Act of 1958, to provide that any person who makes an invention in the course of activities in outer space shall retain all patent rights to such invention

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Outer Space Inventions Act".

SEC. 2. Part II of title 35, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new chapter:

"Chapter 19—PATENT RIGHTS IN INVENTIONS MADE IN OUTER SPACE

"221. Policy and objective.

"222. Ownership of patents on inventions made in outer space.

"223. Reservation of Federal license to use inventions made in outer space with full Federal funding.

"§ 221. Policy and objective

"It is the policy and objective of the Congress to use the patent system to promote the commercialization of outer space; to emphasize long-term economic and policy stability in the commercialization of outer space; to encourage innovative space ventures; to alleviate some of the extraordinary financial risks involved in the commercialization of outer space by business concerns and others; and to provide appropriate incentives for investments in commercial space ventures.

"§ 222. Ownership of patents on inventions made in outer space

"(a) In any case where an invention is made by a person in the course of activities of any kind in outer space, whether made with assistance from one or more Federal agencies or in the course of work performed under contract with one or more Federal agencies or otherwise, such invention shall be the exclusive property of that person, and if the invention is patentable a patent therefor may be issued to that person in accordance with this title notwithstanding any other provision of law. The rights given to an inventor under this subsection may not be waived or abrogated by any contract or other arrangement between the inventor and any such Federal agency.

"(b) As used in this chapter, the terms 'Federal agency' and 'made' have the meanings given them by section 201, and the term 'person' has the meaning given it by section 305(j)(1) of the National Aeronautics and Space Act of 1958.

"§ 223. Reservation of Federal license to use inventions made in outer space with full Federal funding

"In any case where an invention is made by a person in outer space with assistance from one or more Federal agencies or in the course of work performed under contract with one or more Federal agencies, and all or substantially all of the costs incurred and services required by that person in connection with the invention are paid or provided by such agency or agencies as part of such assistance or as payments under such contract, the head of such agency (or any of such agencies) may reserve an irrevocable, nonexclusive, nontransferrable, royalty-free license for the practice of the invention throughout the world by or on behalf of the United States or by any foreign government pursuant to any treaty or agreement with the United States.".

SEC. 3. Section 305 of the National Aeronautics and Space Act of 1958 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(m) None of the provisions of this section shall apply with respect to any invention which, under section 222 of title 35, United States Code, is the exclusive property of the inventor.".

SEC. 4. The amendments made by this Act shall apply with respect to inventions made on or after the date of the enactment of this Act.●

HON. EDWARD F. FEIGHAN

OF OHIO

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, May 26, a memorial Mass was celebrated at St. Paul (Croatian) Roman Catholic Church in Cleveland, OH, to commemorate Croatian war dead and the Croatian victims of the genocide perpetrated by the Yugoslav Communists after the Second World War. Following the ceremony, a commemorative program, sponsored by the Joint American Croatian Organization of Cleveland, was held. During the program, papers and resolutions dealing with the murders of numerous Croatians, including over 200,000 young soldiers, were read and approved. One resolution, signed by Bozidar Abjanic, president, Ratko Barisic, vice president, and Ivan Coric, secretary of the Joint American Croatian Organization of Cleveland, calls for an end to official U.S. silence and for a public acknowledgment of the genocide enacted against the Croatian nation by the Yugoslav Communist regime. The resolution has been called to my attention by Jerome A. Brentar, president of the American Croatian Academic Society.

I believe that other Members of the House will be interested in the resolution, and I ask that it be included in the RECORD.

JOINT COMMITTEE OF CROATIAN AMERICAN ORGANIZATIONS OF CLEVELAND RESOLUTION OF THE 40TH ANNIVERSARY OBSERVANCE OF THE CROATIAN GENOCIDE: SUNDAY, MAY 26, 1985

Whereas on this Memorial Day, a befitting annual observance has been set by the American people to commemorate and honor the war dead of this great country we as American Croatians join in this memorial observance and express our deepest gratitude for the sacrifices of all those Americans, since the founding of this Nation, who gave their lives for the preservation of future generations, and for the democratic ideals embodied in the Constitution and the American way of life; and

Whereas the freedom-seeking Croatian nation, from which we are descended, has also a special meaning to us, the assembly thus finds it especially fitting to honor the Croatian war dead, particularly the 200,000 Croatian soldiers, representing a whole generation of Croatian youth, together with an even greater number of Croatian civilians, who in May 1946, and the end of the World War II hostilities, fell victims to Communist treachery and virtual genocide for the recreation of the synthetic State of Yugoslavia; and

Whereas the perpetrators of genocide utilize mass murder with the intended result of the liquidation of a nation, the assembly, therefore wishes to emphasize to America and the Free World the reason for this horrendous crime by reiterating the phrase propagated by the communist minister of Propaganda and Provocation that "Croatian soldiers must die in order that (then defunct) Yugoslavia may live", which was followed to the letter by the partisan generals, Kosta Nadj and Koca Popovic, Tito's chief henchmen in charge of the genocidal operations against the Croatian nation;

Whereas genocide is an international crime of the worst nature, violating all the inalienable divine, civil and human rights of men and nations to existence, the assembly herewith petitions the U.S. government to end the forty years of public silence in regard to this peacetime holocaust and also to begin an investigation process for identifying the military and government figures involved in the extradition process against the Croatians from surrender points under Western allied control that has allowed for and, in some instances, even encouraged the greatest crime that has been committed against any European nation in the aftermath of World War II. Elementary justice demands that this genocide of the Croatians be acknowledged before the world and that the names of all those who, in any way, have been responsible for its happening be made a part of the public record.●

CHILDREN'S SURVIVAL BILL

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce, along with my colleagues CHARLES RANGEL and MAJOR OWENS, the children's survival bill on behalf of the Children's Defense Fund, a nonprofit organization working to improve the quality of life for low-income children and their families. A companion bill has been introduced in the Senate by Senator CHRISTOPHER DODD.

With this bill, we hope to stem the rising tide of poverty, infant mortality, ill-health, abuse, and neglect that threatens to engulf America's children.

Today we can offer a serious response to the problems our children face. We can create an agenda for investment in children that is worthy of them, which is what this bill does.

I do not believe, given current conditions, this is an opportunity we can pass up.

Failure to act means accepting more impoverished children than at any time in the last 20 years—13.8 million. Three million new poor children in 5 years is a record of shame. We have erased a quarter century of progress in a very short time, and with it, heightened the risks for millions of children.

Failure to act means an end of reductions in the infant mortality rate. Our child health officials admit we cannot reach our own goals. Do we really want to be stuck at No. 16 in the world in infant mortality rates?

Failure to act means accepting more abused children, more untended latchkey children, more pregnant teenagers, more families driven apart unable to provide the basics, drawing on shelters, and soup kitchens for their most basic needs.

There is little doubt or debate over the conditions children now face. Nor do we need to fashion miracle policies to solve these problems.

But we do first have to face reality. We know from our work at the Select Committee on Children, Youth and Families that children and their families are facing stresses greater than those faced in the past. A combination of changes in the workplace, in family composition, and in the economy have pushed children into circumstances that are far different, and in many ways, more difficult, than those in which we grew up. The children's survival bill will promote cost-effective programs which have proven records of preventing abuse and neglect, malnutrition, illiteracy, teen pregnancy, and dependency.

This bill invests in success, in healthier families and children. Four of the programs it contains, will themselves save the tens of millions of dollars, while enriching the lives of our children.

They include:

Head Start: A motivating program for young children that has a 20-year track record of success. For every $1 invested in Head Start, $3 are returned in reduced taxpayer costs, and increased public receipts. Head Start children are less likely to become pregnant as teens, less likely to become dependent on welfare, and more likely to enter vocational school, college, or the workforce.

WIC: The Women, Infants and Children Feeding Program, which study after study has found a success. A $35 a month WIC nutritional package for an infant can save far more than $1,400 a week it costs to hospitalize an infant for treatment of malnutrition.

Chapter I: The Education of the Disadvantaged Program teaches young children to read and compute at a cost of approximately $625 per year, compared to the more than $3,000 cost of keeping a child back to repeat a grade. Currently, nearly 10 million children repeat at least one grade during the course of their education.

Maternal and child health programs: Programs which are especially cost effective. Every dollar spent on comprehensive prenatal care saves $2 in the first year of an infant's life alone because of reduced need for hospital care.

Those are the core programs of this legislative package. They are workable, cost effective and urgently needed.

On behalf of the children of this country, and their futures, I invite you to join with me in cosponsoring the children's survival bill.●

THE ITEM VETO

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I enter into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an excellent editorial appearing recently in the Detroit News on July 22, 1985, denouncing the item veto. I believe this article merits the consideration of all of my colleagues in both bodies.

The article follows:

[From the Detroit News, July 22, 1985]

THE ITEM VETO MIRAGE

A filibuster in the U.S. Senate continues in an effort to block legislation that would give the president a line-item veto. Such a veto would allow the president to eliminate individual items in a congressional appropriations bill. Mr. Reagan has repeatedly called for such authority. On Thursday, he sent a letter to some senators in which he said a line-item veto "would go a long way toward assisting our efforts to provide sound fiscal management at the federal level."

It's a tempting device, particularly on the heels of the recent breakdown in budget negotiations in Congress. Despite all the handwringing about deficits in recent years, the spending path of the federal government has continued inexorably upward. Though revenue is rising at a record rate—because of the tax rate cuts in 1981, not in spite of them—spending has been rising as fast or even faster.

But would a line-item veto be the magic bullet that's needed to break this cycle? The evidence suggests it wouldn't. It might even provide encouragement for more federal spending.

The assumption behind the line-item veto is that presidents are fiscally prudent, while Congress, caught in the grip of narrow special interests, is profligate with federal tax dollars. But as Norman J. Ornstein, a scholar at the American Enterprise Institute and a student of Congress, has pointed out, our history suggests that presidents are no more willing than congressmen to take the political heat for cutting politically popular spending projects.

"More often than not," Mr. Ornstein has written in Fortune magazine, "Congress has had to protect the public purse from presidents pursuing expensive military objectives, wanting to buy more territory, or expanding federal involvement in commercial affairs." The self-aggrandizing tendency of the executive branch, Mr. Ornstein adds, can be seen in the parliamentary governments of the European nations, where strong executives dominate weak legislatures. In almost all cases, European government expenditures consume a larger portion of the gross national product than in the United States.

Adoption of the line-item veto would significantly change the balance between the executive branch and Congress, as those opposing it in the Senate, such as Charles McC. Mathias Jr. of Maryland, point out. An example: If the president wants congressional support for one of his spending projects, he can call up a senator or congressman and demand support for his project—with the threat that the dam or highway for the congressman's district will be line-itemed out of the budget if the vote goes the wrong way. Log-rolling will simply be extended one step further. The net result will be that the public will wind up paying for the president's pet projects and the congressman's projects, too.

Then there is the risk that members of Congress, secure in the knowledge that the president has line-item veto power, will dump ever more egregious amounts of pork into the federal budget, expecting the president to cut it while they take the credit from their constituents for trying to "bring home the bacon." Multiply that temptation 535 times and you have a formula for government spending growing even more wildly out of control.

But why, supporters of the line-item veto ask, should the president be denied the power granted to 43 state governors? Hasn't the line-item veto worked in those states? No. Benjamin Zycher, an economist at Cal Tech, has examined state and local spending in the seven states without an item veto and found that on average, their per capita spending rates are lower than in the rest of the states. The Constitution has already given President Reagan a weapon to cut federal spending that he has been loath to use; the veto. A study by Heritage Foundation scholars James Gatusso and Stephen Moore notes that Mr. Reagan vetoed 39 bills in his first term, slightly below the historical average. Ten out of the 15 presidents in this century, they add, vetoed more frequently than Mr. Reagan. In fact, Gerald Ford, whom Mr. Reagan called "soft on spending" in 1976, vetoed spending bills at four times the rate that Mr. Reagan has, according to Messrs. Gatusso and Moore.

The case for granting the president—any president—line-item veto power is dubious. Its benefits are a mirage. If Mr. Reagan wants to put a lid on spending, he could make more effective use of the tools he already has. The budget problem is fundamentally a political problem. Until a constituency has been built for cutting spending in significant ways, it matters little what devices we put in the hands of the politicians. We have opposed the idea of a constitutional amendment to balance the budget for much the same reason.

The line-item veto would do far less violence to the established ways of doing business then a balanced-budget amendment, and for that reason we would oppose its adoption too violently. But anybody who thinks it's likely to solve the federal governments' penchant for spending is likely to be disappointed.●

APARTHEID AS THE CAUSE OF REBELLION

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, we live in an age which has witnessed countless rebellions, coups, and civil wars. These events have sometimes been instigated by small groups of leftist or rightist extremists but, as often as not, a legitimate grievance has led common men and women to rise up.

Apartheid is the root cause of unrest in South Africa. The violence has not been inspired by communist ideology or terrorist fanaticism. Nor has it been engendered by racist polarization between blacks and whites. The catalyst has been a social system, one that has exploited a majority for the benefit of a minority.

The system of apartheid will not last forever. It cannot. Sheer numbers, combined with black activism, make apartheid's demise a matter of time. It is my hope that the white minority will relent before it is too late.

I would like to insert the following editorials into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The column written by Bishop Desmond Tutu is particularly enlightening, and I urge my colleagues to consider it as the debate on United States/South Africa ties continues.

[From USA Today July 22, 1985]

THE ONLY ISSUE IS RACIST APARTHEID

Once more the dagger of apartheid has blood flowing from the wounds of South Africa—and still the racist government there clings to the myth that blacks are inferior and unworthy of full citizenship rights.

This weekend, the Botha government declared a state of emergency, the first in 25 years, and began throwing blacks in jail without due process of law.

For a year, the unrest among blacks has seethed. Gradually, a ground swell of black protest has gained momentum. There have been marches by blacks who have been met by force of arms, tear gas, gunfire. Now there are economic boycotts—blacks refusing to trade with white merchants.

And there is widespread disorder. Arson and stone-throwing, met by police tear gas and bullets, occured in 20 townships over the weekend.

Rivulets of blood threaten to become a raging river.

Sunday, police shot and killed three blacks in Tumahole. Not all the bloodshed has been by one race directed against the other. Last week, a black woman who traded with a white store owner was brutally slain by angry blacks.

In 10 months, more than 450 have been killed, hundreds of others jailed, and thousands have been wounded.

Many who are held in prison were arrested only because they spoke out against government racism.

Racial violence is by no means new to South Africa. Nor is the oppressive action of a government that has jailed blacks without legitimate charges, punished them without trial, and, in many documented cases, killed them for their political beliefs.

In the past, when discontent festered then erupted into outbreaks, the authorities smothered them. Always, there have been warnings that some day . . . some day . . .

But the racist leadership is too insensitive to listen, too intransigent to change, too ignorant to understand that 5 million whites cannot forever suppress the burning hopes of 22 million blacks for a chance to learn, to work, to vote, to live with dignity in freedom. The new, so-called "colored parliament" is a fraud on its face. Powerless.

In the USA, there has been a building sense of disgust over the rancid racism in South Africa.

In Congress, in corporations with investments in South Africa, in institutions of higher learning, and on the streets there have been different sorts of demonstrations reflecting outrage and opposition to South Africa's policies.

At this point, there is concern and fear that finally time may be running out in South Africa. Something—everything—must be done to try to bring the leaders there out of their mindless stupor.

Persuasion, diplomacy, economic sanctions—all this and more must be used to warn them that they will be wading into a bloodbath that will drown them.

They must wake up to the fact that "some day" may be now.

VIOLENCE WON'T SOLVE PROBLEMS

(By Desmond Tutu, Guest Columnist)

JOHANNESBURG, SOUTH AFRICA—The basic cause of all the trouble in our country is apartheid. Many in the black community, incensed at the injustice of apartheid, believe that anyone who collaborates to any extent with the apartheid system is a co-oppressor.

Collaborators were dealt with very, very harshly, with summary justice, during World War II. In Ulster, those thought to be sellouts of the IRA cause often have their kneecaps shot off. This is not to condone what is done, but it is a phenomenon that is universal.

Our effort as the church is to say that any form of violence is unacceptable and will not in the end solve the problems of our country. I spoke out very, very firmly against this kind of violence and said, "It fills or ought to fill any right-thinking person with repugnance." I called on the black community please to desist from methods that would discredit our cause.

I said, "You are harming the cause of liberation, because the government of South Africa will merely display scenes of this kind and say, 'Do you think that these people deserve the freedom for which they are crying out and for which they are working?'" This causes us considerable concern.

There is an escalation of violence in this land, and a great deal of it stems from the authorities. We are beginning to see something very much like what is happening in many Latin American countries.

But we in the churches are saying that there is still a great deal of good will, and if only the government were willing to sit down with the authentic leaders and representatives of every section of our community, there would be the possibility of moving forward.

As a Christian, there cannot come a time when we give in to despair and pessimism.

Because of the death and resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ, we are bound to be prisoners of hope and hold onto the belief that it is still possible to persuade the authorities to see that our land is going to go up in flames unless they do what we are suggesting.●

THE 20TH ANNIVERSARY OF MEDICARE

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, today is the 20th anniversary of Medicare—a key program in the promise of a great society for all Americans, young and old.

Twenty years ago, we as a nation promised our senior citizens they would have access to health care and protection from financial disaster brought on by high medical bills. Today, we have yet to fulfill that promise. On its 20th birthday, Medicare offers older Americans only partial protection against hospital and medical expenses, and no coverage at all for major expenses such as long-term care and prescription drugs.

Adequate health care protection is a crucial component of retirement security. As we age, senior citizens need roughly twice as much health care as younger Americans. Yet, older Americans continue to face the very real possibility of financial ruin from long term, disabling illness.

Before Medicare began, senior citizens were spending 15 percent of their income on health care. Now, after 20 years of health care inflation and 5 years of the Reagan administration's budget cuts, seniors again are spending 15 percent of their income on health care. By 1990, the elderly's health bills will consume almost 19 percent of their total income, or close to $2,600 annually. In addition, by 1990, the elderly's projected annual rise in health care costs will be 10.4 percent, although their income will grow by only 6.4 percent.

These figures describe the average burden. Medicare, as we know, covers only the average health care expenses. However, for the elderly in need of long-term care—the most threatening of unmet health care needs—prospects are even more grim. For over one-third of the elderly—and for over 60 percent of the elderly who live alone—the onset of a chronic illness such as Alzheimers would drive them completely into poverty within a matter of weeks. This is because Medicare contributes next to nothing toward the expenses of long-term care.

Medicare also contributes little or nothing toward the cost of prescription drugs, preventive care, dental care, vision care, hearing care, mental health care, or foot care. Furthermore, the heath care that is covered under Medicare will grow more and more expensive if the Reagan administration persists in its policies of raising premiums, copayments, and deductibles for the elderly. This must not continue.

As Medicare enters its third decade, let us strive to improve the program and fulfill its promise. To do this, we must accomplish three goals:

First, we must reject all efforts to place the elderly at greater risk by increasing the cost of their health care under Medicare. Never again should a President's budget threaten the elderly with delayed eligibility, higher payments, or reduced coverage under Medicare. Such cuts are not only cruel, they are contrary to the program's purpose and exacerbate existing problems of limited access to care and high costs.

Second, we must take steps to make Medicare the comprehensive health care program that it was intended to be, and which seniors need. I have introduced a package of legislation to fill in the gaps in Medicare coverage. H.R. 1401 would cover long-term care under Medicare through innovative, comprehensive programs providing case management and community care. H.R. 1402 would offer a preventive care option under Medicare to cover regular health screening for the elderly. Finally, H.R. 1403 would create a part C of Medicare to cover dental, vision and hearing care, and prescription drugs. These benefit reform bills are vitally necessary if seniors are to have adequate health coverage to meet their needs.

Third, we must adopt reasonable, effective health care cost containment strategies so that neither Medicare, nor the elderly it serves will be threatened further by uncontrolled inflation. By working closely with health care providers, private employers, and the States, we can achieve our cost containment goals while protecting access to care for all Americans.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the 20th anniversary of Medicare is a time not only to reflect and celebrate, but to accept a challenge. Our Nation has both the will and the resources to fulfill the promise of adequate health care protection for all its citizens. Let us get on with this worthy task.●

NOMINATION OF ALFRED A. SLOCUM AS NEW JERSEY'S PUBLIC ADVOCATE

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, last week Governor Kean of New Jersey nominated Rutgers Law School professor Alfred Slocum to be the State's public advocate. Al is a distinguished lawyer, a champion of the underprivileged, a committee advocate, and a good friend. I want to extend my congratulations on his nomination.

Al's exemplary career is a story of energy, ingenuity, intelligence, and dedication. Born and raised in East Orange, NJ, Al earned his bachelor's degree from the Newark College of Engineering and worked as an electrical engineer for nearly a decade. During this time, he served on the NAACP but got frustrated hearing lawyers tell him what could not be done. So he went to law school—to find out what could be done.

Al attended Rutgers Law School in Newark, close to home, and while there helped found the Minority Student Program, which remains a success today. Upon graduation in 1970, he accepted a part-time position on the Rutgers faculty while obtaining his master of laws degree from Yale University School of Law. Since than, he has taught at Rutgers.

Al has been an active member of the legal community. Last fall he was elected president of the Council on Legal Education Opportunity, a nationwide program partially funded by the American Bar Association to help economically and academically deprived students prepare for law school. He is also on the board of directors of the Puerto Rican Legal Defense and Education Fund and the Essex County Legal Services Program, and is a member of the National Conference of Black Lawyers. Previously he has served as general counsel of the National Organization of Black Law Enforcement Executives.

The public advocate position is a challenge, and Al is the right man for it. The position was created under former Gov. Brendan Byrne to meet the very real need for providing legal access and advocacy for the many citizens who otherwise stand powerless before large institutions. Although "equal justice for all" is one of the great promises of our democracy, it is little more than an abstract notion for many Americans. The public advocate's role is to make this promise a reality. I know Al will do everything in his power to do just that.

My best wishes go out to Al Slocum as he undertakes his new role. He is a superb choice, and he will fulfill his responsibilities with great distinction.●

AMWAY CORP. CELEBRATES 25TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. PAUL B. HENRY

OF MICHIGAN

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, 25 years ago, two enterprising business partners from my district, Jay Van Andel and Richard DeVos, launched Amway Corp. from the basements of their Michigan homes. Combining their business acumen and leadership talents, DeVos and Van Andel built Amway into a major force in our national economy and the world's direct selling industry.

Today, Amway Corp. operates in more than 40 countries and territories around the world through 1 million independent distributors. Those distributors can offer their customers nearly 400 Amway products, most of which are manufactured at the company's world headquarters in Ada, MI, or its Nutrilite Products subsidiary in Buena Park, CA. Thus, Amway contributes directly to reducing our Nation's international trading deficit.

Throughout its history, Amway's cofounders have remained faithful to the fundamental principles of free enterprise and personal liberty. While building its sales to over $1 billion annually, this company consistently rewards individual success in proportion to individual effort.

Amway is one of our Nation's largest enterprises, providing a business opportunity to millions around the world. Therefore, I would like to ask my fellow Members to join me in offering our warmest congratulations to Amway Corp. on the occasion of its 25th anniversary—along with best wishes for many more years of business success.●

PROHIBIT USE OF FUNDS TO PERFORM ABORTIONS

HON. MARILYN LLOYD

OF TENNESSEE

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, earlier today, I voted for an amendment offered by Mr. SMITH of New Jersey to the D.C. appropriations bill to prohibit the use of funds to perform abortions. While I supported this amendment, I strongly feel that it should include an exception for the life of the mother. I have consistently voted for pro-life Measures in Congress with the expressed feeling that the life of the mother was paramount. It is my understanding that when this bill goes to conference a life of the mother disclaimer will be added.

I'm pleased to have had the honor of being voted the outstanding pro-life member of Congress by the American Life Lobby because of my strong support for the unborn. And while we have made significant progress in our fight for the right to life we must not relax our efforts. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this effort and call on the conferees to recognize the importance of protecting not just the unborn infant's life but also the life of the mother.●

FRIENDS OF THE EARTH OPPOSES U.S. POLICY TOWARD NICARAGUA

HON. MIKE LOWRY

OF WASHINGTON

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. LOWRY of Washington. I would like to bring my colleagues' attention to a recent statement on Nicaragua by the environmental organization Friends of the Earth.

I believe that there are many reasons why the Reagan administration's policy toward Nicaragua is wrong and is not in the best interests of the United States. The victims of this policy are farmers, teachers, medical workers, and other innocent people. The policy is a counterproductive throwback to the old days of gunboat diplomacy that has negative effects throughout Latin America because it violates the principle of noninterventionism in a way that deeply concerns democratic elements in the region. It violates international law and treaty obligations which our Nation has pledged to honor. It employs a hypocritical double standard to criticize Nicaragua's human rights record while ignoring serious human rights abuses in other Central American countries. Finally, it risks more direct U.S. involvement, which would be disastrous. For these reasons, I continue to oppose U.S. aid to the Contras and to favor meaningful support for the Contadora process as well as negotiations between the United States and Nicaraguan Governments.

The Friends of the Earth resolution offers another perspective on this issue which I thought would be of interest. I commend it to your attention.

RESOLUTION ON UNITED STATES IN NICARAGUA

Whereas the state of the environment in Central America is of concern to Friends of the Earth, and;

Whereas the elected government of Nicaragua has attempted to improve previous environmentally destructive policies by: initiating reforestation projects, instituting integrated pest management programs in agriculture, protecting genetic diversity in the wild and in seed banks, initiating agrarian reform and land redistribution, developing alternative soft-path energy systems, creating a national park system, protecting endangered wildlife, initiating a literacy campaign, and more, and;

Whereas Friends of the Earth would like to acknowledge the existence and implementation of sound environmental policies by the government of Nicaragua, and;

Whereas Friends of the Earth would like to encourage the government of Nicaragua to continue and expand sound environmental policies, and;

Whereas Nicaragua's environmental policies serve as a positive model for the region, and;

Whereas sound environmental policies offer the possibility of a sustainable society in Nicaragua, and;

Whereas the Contra war is draining Nicaragua's economic, human, and physical resources necessary to implement sound environmental policies, and;

Whereas the Contra war is making it physically impossible to safely institute many environmental reforms such as reforestation, and;

Whereas warfare is directly destructive to the environment, and;

Whereas the continued state of war in Nicaragua causes refugees and others to utilize the land more harshly than they might otherwise, and;

Whereas costs to the United States of funding the Contra war divert dollars, talents, attention, and resources from our own environment's protection and restoration, and;

Whereas Friends of the Earth believes that peaceful solutions to conflicts are possible: Be it, therefore,

Resolved, That Friends of the Earth, recognizing the moral imperative requiring it to address the Nicaraguan conflict for the sake of the Nicaraguan people and the Central American environment, calls upon the United States government to end its Contra war in Nicaragua and seek peaceful solutions to that conflict.●

INTRODUCTION OF RETIREMENT-USA: LEGISLATION TO IMPROVE PENSION COVERAGE, PORTABILITY, AND ASSET PRESERVATION FOR RETIREMENT

HON. JAMES M. JEFFORDS

OF VERMONT

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, today my colleagues on the Committee on Education and Labor—Mrs. MARGE ROUKEMA, Mr. ROD CHANDLER, Mr. MAJOR OWENS, Mr. THOMAS E. PETRI, Mr. MERVYN DYMALLY, Mr. THOMAS J. TAUKE, Mr. WILLIAM D. FORD—and I are introducing a new legislative concept, "Retirement-USA," which is designed to improve pension coverage, to institute a form of pension portability, and to better preserve current pension plan asset accumulations for the payment of retirement benefits.

Our legislation, the Retirement Universal Security Arrangements Act of 1985, amends ERISA, the Employees Retirement Income Security Act of 1974, and the Internal Revenue Code to address those retirement issues which ERISA did not address or did not address well.

Take the issue of pension coverage. Experts agree that the widespread lack of pension coverage is the most serious problem remaining to be addressed by ERISA. Critics of the current tax structure also charge that by leaving out half of the Nation's work force, the system is inefficient and inequitable; they demand more from the $56 billion in retirement plan related tax expenditures. Far too many of our Nation's workers rely on Social Security alone for their retirement security. About half of recent retirees must meet their retirement living expenses without the benefit of employer sponsored or other individual retirement savings. The "Retirement-USA concept" meets head-on this challenge to expand pension coverage. It offers employers an attractive incentive to contribute on behalf of their employees to meet retirement, death, and disability needs; and it removes the significant barriers currently hindering employers from making pension contributions, as outlined in the May 1985 President's report on the State of Small Business.

Pension asset managers would establish Retirement-USA's thus removing the employer's burden to do so—for example, no employer start up costs. The pension asset manager of the Retirement-USA relieves the employer's burden by assuming all ERISA reporting, disclosure, and fiduciary obliations. The Retirement-USA operates with no administrative cost charged to the employer and the employer is under no obligation to continue to make contributions to a Retirement-USA—and, therefore, has no plan termination costs either. Employers would contribute on a simple formula percentage of compensation basis while employees would match employer contributions on a salary reduction, 401(k)-like basis, up to $2,000. Employees are more likely to save if the amounts do not show up in their W-2 wages. Finally, Retirement-USA's are group plans offering employees the freedom of choice of self-directed investments and availability of annuity, survivor, and other retirement income options.

A recent NBC news program labeled our Nation's $1.3 trillion in pension assets, "The Biggest Lump of Money in the World." A second pension policy challenge is to improve the efficiency with which this "Biggest Lump" delivers retirement income to supplement Social Security. Today too much of this sum is being cashed out and used for current consumption. This trend, magnified by the rise in the prevalence of defined contribution plans making distributions at job termination, will, if not properly channeled, have a negative effect on our national savings pool—pension assets being a primary source for new capital formation. On the other side of the coin, our increasingly mobile labor force, while generating a more frequent turnover of pension assets, is demanding a more attractive pension portability vehicle than currently exists.

The Retirement-USA steps up to meet these challenges to preserve pension assets for retirement purposes. Retirement-USA's are group portability plans that, unlike IRA's, allow employees to rollover their after-tax employee contributions as well as their pretax pension plan distribution. Retirement-USA's give employers a new incentive and means to deliver retirement benefits rather than lump-sum cash-outs. Retirement-USA's, as group plans, can offer spousal annuity and other retirement options at a lower cost—to emphasize the role of Retirement-USA's as a supplement to Social Security, all distributions would be made in a stream-of-income form unless spousal consent is otherwie obtained. Consistent with the current tax reform proposals before the Congress, if premature pension distributions are made subject to an excise tax, then such distributions from employer plans would be required to be transferred to a Retirement-USA, thus keeping such funds in the national savings column and lessening the future burden on Social Security.

The Retirement-USA legislation explicitly recognizes as a cornerstone of our national retirement income policy the so-called three-legged stool consisting of Social Security, employer provided pensions, and individual retirement savings.

By strengthening the second leg of the pension stool—the employer provided portion—the Retirement-USA concept builds on the Social Security floor of protection to the end that the private pension system is made more efficient in delivering retirement income. This result is also consistent that the tax policy goals—to achieve greater horizontal tax equity—embodied in the tax reform measures currently being debated in the Congress. We have worked cooperatively with the Department of the Treasury to achieve this result.

In brief the goals of the Retirement-USA concept are—first, to preserve preretirement pension plan distributions in the form of retirement savings for their ultimate payout in monthly benefit form to meet death, disability, and retirement needs; second, to provide voluntary pension portability for our increasingly mobile workforce by allowing employers to transfer to Retirement-USA's of their choice both after-tax and before-tax employee and employer pension accumulations for their terminated workers; and third, to improve tax equity for those employees not now covered under employer sponsored plans by removing ERISA burdens on employers, by providing a no-administrative-cost incentive for such employers to contribute for their employees on an immediately vested and nonintegrated basis, and by allowing matching tax-deductible employee contributions to Retirement-USA's.

The Retirement-USA concept can be likened to a statutory prototype tax-qualified defined-contribution pension plan. The arrangement is established and maintained by pension assets managers, in other words, those insurance companies, banks, mutual funds, and other managers now serving the pension investment community. Under the arrangement the employee-participants would self-direct their accumulated investments and each USA would have to provide at least three investment options—one of which would have to be principally backed by Treasury obligations—to serve both as an employee investment safe-haven and as a new source of Treasury financing to help lower interest costs. To emphasize the role of Retirement-USA as a supplement to Social Security death, disability, and retirement benefits, all distributions would be made in a stream-of-income form unless spousal consent is otherwise obtained.

Besides offering the employers of uncovered workers new incentives and a no-frills mechanism to make pension contributions, Retirement-USA's would provide employers who already have pension plans with a more meaningful option—a pension portability option—which contrasts with today's practice of cashing-out the vested benefits of terminated employees. Instead of cashing-out or retaining the accounts of terminated employees, an employer could transfer the cash value of vested amounts to a Retirement-USA. The amount transferred could be above or below the $3,500 limit under the Retirement Equity Act, thus relieving employers of the administrative burden of maintaining terminated employee accounts. It is intended that the proposal achieve the goal of retaining capital in the private sector for economic development while lessening the pressure for future increases in income transfer programs.

In summary the Retirement-USA concept was developed to take a long-term view with respect to retirement income policy; to address the fairness and horizontal tax equity issue in the retirement context; to address the challenges of a changing work force, increasing mobility and multiple careers, shifting of employment from heavy industry to service sector, need for employment of older workers, and so forth; to increase the efficiency of the private pension system in providing retirement income supplemental to Social Security; to address the growing demands for retirement flexibility and individual investment choice; and to improve on the capital formation and efficient market capabilities of the private pension system.

By way of background, in developing the Retirement-USA concept, it has been the view of not only my colleagues and I, but also the consensus of several Presidential commissions and other private and governmental study groups on retirement that a long-term approach should be fashioned in this most critical area of domestic policy. Trends in demographic, economic, employment and other social factors give clear warning that shortsighted policy changes today could serve up to future generations a retirement crisis of major proportions.

As a reflection of these concerns the Committee on Education and Labor, on which I serve as the ranking member, recently completed its hearings on the need for a national retirement income policy. There were several themes stemming from those hearings in which there appeared to be a rather broad consensus.

Let me capsulize some of these major issues reflecting my views and those of others who shared their expertise on the subject matter.

First, retirement and pension policy should be developed to take into account not only tax policy but social-labor policy as well. It follows that our national goal should be to explicitly recognize the so-called three-legged stool consisting of Social Security, employer provided pensions, and individual retirement savings as the basis for achieving adequate levels of retirement income.

Social Security must be recognized for what it was intended—as a basic floor of protection for every worker. Today all but a small minority of workers retire from their full-time jobs at age 65 or younger. Under the 1983 Social Security Amendments, future workers who voluntarily or involuntarily, because of health reasons, choose to retire at age 65 or under will have to adjust to retirement income levels up to 15 percent lower than is the case for today's retirees relying on Social Security alone. Not all future workers will have the opportunity to delay retirement until full Social Security benefits are available at age 67 or later. I mention this only to emphasize the point that in the future the other two legs of the three-legged stool—that is, employer provided pensions and individual retirement savings—will have to be relied on even more heavily than at present, if the relative retirement income levels of future retirees are to keep pace with today's levels.

Therefore, it is my conclusion that this is not the time for the Congress to be reducing incentives—tax incentives or otherwise—for employers and individuals to make contributions to pension arrangements providing more adequate supplements to Social Security. Even today too many workers, and as shown in the New Beneficiary Survey roughly one-half of new retirees, rely almost exclusively on Social Security. Rather than viewing current tax expenditures related to employer and individual retirement plans as a source to meet short-term budget and revenue needs, the policy focus should be a long-term one centered on making these expenditures a more efficient supplement to Social Security.

While a variety of ERISA changes for making the private pension system more efficient were suggested during the course of the Committee on Education and Labor's hearing on national retirement income policy, the themes most often repeated by business, labor, and employee groups fell into three general categories—briefly stated they are coverage, portability, and what I will term "pension preservation".

In his testimony Senator JOHN HEINZ stated that "coverage is the most serious problem." Dr. Emily Andrews of the Employee Benefit Research Institute [EBRI] reported on a disturbing finding from her research on pension coverage. She found that the coverage rate among nonfarm workers fell from 61 percent in 1979 to 56 percent in 1983. Stating that few are forecasting the robust growth in pension coverage experienced before 1979, she suggested the decline may have been caused by the 1982 recession and by post-ERISA legislation such as ERTA, Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 and TEFRA, Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982. Citing these and other examples of the effect of the frequent tax law changes to pension plans, the pension plan community seems to be speaking with one voice when as one proponent stated it "for the private employee benefit system to prosper, Government must follow a consistent and coherent long-term approach and not continually shift policies." Some suggest a 5-year moratorium on pension plan changes once a long-term policy has been put into place.

The individual retirement account [IRA] was the concept devised at the time ERISA, the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 was enacted to address the coverage and tax equity concerns at that time. Between 1975, the first year of IRA availability, and 1981, the last year the IRA was limited to the uncovered worker, utilization increased from 2.5 percent of those eligible to only 7 percent of the nearly 50 million uncovered work force. Even though the institution of the universal IRA in 1982 has expanded IRA coverage, principally for those who are already covered under pension plans, the fact remains that standing alone the IRA has not proven adequate as a pension savings vehicle for the vast numbers in the uncovered work force.

Given this fact as well as the current stagnation, if not retreat, in the percentage of workers covered by employer-pensions, we, as a nation, must consider the remarks of Dr. Andrews who concluded that "the challenge is to devise policies to encourage expanded coverage without producing adverse indirect effects on workers or firms." The Retirement-USA is the concept my colleagues and I have developed to meet this challenge.

The second general issue category suggested to us by business, labor, and employee groups as being ripe for policy development is along the lines of what some have labeled "pension portability." This term is not a well-defined one, but one business organization suggested that "it may be that portability's time has come" if the following advantages would accrue to employees and employers—if it would help to protect the purchasing power of an employee's vested benefits, and if it would remove from the employer's cost of administration those amounts attributable to maintaining the funds and records of vested terminated employees.

Additionally it was suggested that any proposal for portability address, among other things, the treatment of cash outs, whether participation should be optional, and the potential for a private sector solution. Advocates for multiemployer and single employer pension plans have expressed concerns that any portability scheme not mandate cash outs lest it lead to the underfunding of defined benefit plans. The Retirement-USA concept is designed to take all of these policy considerations into account, including the need for the portability of nondeductible employee contributions previously made to both private and public pension plans which are now precluded from IRA rollover treatment.

The third pension policy area in which there is a strong current for bipartisan agreement relates to what I have labeled "pension preservation." In the words of my Committee on Education and Labor colleague, BILL CLAY, "we ought to do more to insure that retirement plans are used to pay retirement benefits." The leading spokesman for multiemployer plans has also stated that the "practice of prematurely cashing out retirement benefits for consumption purposes ought to be discouraged." The explanation accompanying the President's tax reform initiative suggests that the proposed excise tax on premature pension distributions is designed to encourage retirement savings and discourage early and lump-sum withdrawals. Whatever appropriate means is finally fashioned to preserve current pension plan assets to pay retirement benefits and stem the considerable leakage from the system to the current consumption column, and the Retirement-USA vehicle is consistent with this policy concept, it is clear that not only will the private pension system be made efficient, but that national savings and capital formation will also be enhanced.

While retirement savings should be emphasized under any national retirement income policy that might be devised, plan savings by employees on an after-tax basis, for retirement or otherwise, should continue to be allowed. In this way individuals having fewer resources and who are less benefited by tax-deductible contributions, or salary-reduction tax treatment, will continue to participate in plans and increase the likelihood of their having a more adequate retirement income. Our legislation advances this concept by allowing the rollover of such nondeductible employee contributions into Retirement-USA's.

The question has been asked, "What role Federal tax policy plays in retirement income security?" Clearly, up to this point it has played an obvious and instrumental one in encouraging the growth of the private pension system—a true success story for the one-half of the work force covered by private pensions. The three policy topics I've described—coverage, portability, and pension preservation—are choice candidates for inclusion in any revised retirement policy structure which seeks to improve on the efficiency of the current supplemental employer plan and individual retirement savings framework. That framework is essentially a voluntary one, and we in the Congress must be careful to recognize that element as we fashion our intended improvements.

Pension plans provide the largest single source of new investment funds to our capital markets. To err in our policy judgment by reducing pension growth, which has already led to the accumulation of over $1.3 trillion under private and public plans, could result in a crippling of our national savings rate—already low at just above 6 percent—and place enormous upward pressure on interest rates. Increased efficiency both in retirement benefit delivery and in tax equity rather than systemwide reductions should be our bywords in the retirement policy arena.

These principles form the basis on which the following features of the Retirement-USA legislation have been developed.

Section 101 adds a new "Title V—Retirement Universal Security Arrangements" to ERISA.

Section 5001 of ERISA describes the general features of a retirement universal security arrangement—Retirement-USA—and states that such an arrangement may not accept contributions until a determination is made by the Secretary of the Treasury that the arrangement contains certain qualification requirements.

Section 5002 defines the term "pension asset manager." Generally, pension asset managers include those financial institutions and professional managers recognized by the Department of Labor as managing current pension asset portfolios under ERISA. Pension asset managers establish Retirement-USA's, not the employers who choose to transfer amounts from existing plans or who choose to contribute to such arrangements on behalf of their uncovered employees. Therefore, pension asset managers assume the reporting, disclosure, fiduciary, and other duties under ERISA, thus removing one of the significant barriers to employer establishment of pension plans; for example, see chapter 5 of the "State of Small Business: A Report of the President," May 1985. With respect to the pension coverages issue, the Retirement-USA concept addresses the shortcomings of current law by targeting the uncovered worker in a more equitable and tax-efficient manner.

In addition to removing the abovementioned ERISA barrier to plan establishment, as described in following sections, the Retirement-USA concept encourages employer participation by operating with no administrative cost charged to the employer, by including a provision—similar to the rule for simplified employee pensions or SEP's—that an employer need not make continuous contributions, by simplifying the contribution formula which operates on an immediately vested, nonintegrated, and nondiscriminatory manner, by allowing employees to make contributions, on a salary reduction or 401(k)-like basis, matching the level of employer contributions up to $2,000, by providing important spousal and survivor protections, and by providing for employee freedom of choice to self-direct investments and receive payments in an annuity or other retirement income form.

Section 5003 provides that a Retirement-USA meeting the requirements of sections 5001(a), 5002(c), 5004, 5005, 5006, 5007, and subtitles C and D shall be considered to be a trust of a plan which meets the qualification requirements of section 410(a) of the Internal Revenue Code and is exempt from taxation under section 501(a) of such Code. The Secretary of the Treasury is to prescribe one or more prototype arrangements in order to facilitate the qualification process. Disqualification of an arrangement is not to be resorted to unless the civil and tax remedies applicable to such arrangement fail to achieve compliance.

Section 5004 extends the ERISA exclusive purpose rule to Retirement-USA's. As stated previously, such arrangements are to operate without administrative cost to contributing employers.

Section 5005 extends the ERISA nonforfeitability rule to Retirement-USA's. All contributions made to such an arrangement are 100 percent immediately vested in the participant.

Section 5006 requires Retirement-USA's to provide at least three investment options—in individual or pooled arrangements—at least one of which is principally backed by U.S. Treasury obligations—to serve as an employee safe-haven and as the default option in the case another option is not chosen by the participant. The excluded investments and 7-day free-look protection generally follow the IRA rules. Participants must be able to switch investments at least semiannually, although as under IRA's certain penalties can be made applicable in the case of premature switching, withdrawal, or transfer to another Retirement-USA.

Section 5007 extends the ERISA antiassignment and alienation provisions to Retirement-USA's.

Section 5008 defines terms and provides for rules of construction in connection with the application of various provisions of ERISA title I to Retirement-USA's.

Under subtitle B, section 5101, the ERISA annual report, disclosure of participant account balance, plan description, and related requirements are tailored to extend to Retirement-USA's in a manner similar to which they apply to defined contribution plans. Unless an alternative method of compliance is provided, Retirement-USA's must provide participants with part A prospectus information on investment options. Nothing in the legislation is intended to change the application of existing banking, insurance, or securities laws in this or any other connection.

Section 5102 extends the ERISA fiduciary provisions to Retirement-USA's. To avoid duplication, only the prohibited transaction provisions applicable to IRA's under section 4975 of the Internal Revenue Code apply to the accounts of participants under Retirement-USA's.

Section 5103 extends the ERISA title I enforcement provisions to Retirement-USA's.

Section 5201—subtitle C—generally describes the employee and employer contributions that may be made to a Retirement-USA.

Section 5202 allows as permissible contributions to a Retirement-USA—first, any rollover amount from another tax qualified plan, under new IRC section 402(a)(10), the transfer of nondeductible employee contributions to a Retirement-USA does not disqualify the rollover of the remainder of a plan distribution; second, an employee contribution, treated in the same manner as a salary-reduction payment under a 401(k) plan, which does not exceed the lesser of $2,000 or the amount of any employer contribution of the year; third, a payment by an individual which is treated in the same manner and subject to the same limits as a contribution to an IRA; and fourth, the payment of some or all of the amount of any nondeductible employee contributions distributed from a tax qualified plan—a Retirement-USA may, but is not required to, accept such nondeductible amounts. As under IRA's, employee contributions for a calendar year may be made before April 15 of the following year.

Section 5203 permits employers to make contributions to Retirement-USA's on behalf of their employees not covered under another pension plan. In order to initially target the availability of Retirement-USA's to the currently uncovered population, the employer's eligible work force must not have accrued a benefit under another plan for the previous 2 years—except in the case of a collectively bargained unit or a self-employed situation. Generally an employer must contribute on behalf of all noncovered employees in the general work force except that employees who are highly paid or who have worked less than 1 year may be excluded. In addition the ERISA age 21, resident alien, and collective bargaining exclusions are also permitted. The Secretary of the Treasury may provide, by regulation, that an employee may contribute for an allowable subdivision of an employer's general work force which is distinguishable by its distinct locality or separate product line.

The total amount of an employer's contribution—together with the amount of any employee contribution treated as a salary-reduction under section 5202—is limited in the same manner as for defined contribution plans under section 415 of the Internal Revenue Code. The employer may make contributions for each employee as a fixed percentage of compensation, subject to the SEP definition, or as a fixed dollar amount or in any combination of the two forms. As under SEP's employer contributions for a year may be made until April 15 of the following year—if so designated. The only reporting obligation of the employer is to submit to the Retirement-USA a listing by category of employee compensation and other relevant identification information in connection with the employer and employee contributions actually made for the year. Such listing meets the reporting requirement to the IRS if attached to the employer's Federal income tax return. Generally, the enforcement of contribution rules and limits is accomplished through tax sanctions administered by the IRS and by employee rights of action as under ERISA, the tax status of the Retirement-USA is generally not affected by such actions.

Section 5301 under subtitle D requires a Retirement-USA to provide for the distribution of a participant's account in a permitted retirement income form unless spousal consent is obtained. Permitted retirement income forms include a qualified joint and survivor annuity, other joint and single life annuity forms, and a recomputed distribution over life expectancy. The distribution rules under section 408(a)(6) of the Internal Revenue Code also apply.

Section 5302 provides that transfers among Retirement-USA's are to be allowed with respect to some or all of a participant's account balance, subject to certain permitted exceptions.

Section 102 amends ERISA and the Internal Revenue Code to allow for the voluntary transfer to a Retirement-USA from a tax qualified plan of the present value of the entire nonforfeitable benefit of a participant—or the participant's spouse in the case of the death of a participant—without such transfer being a violation of the restrictions under ERISA sections 203(e) and (g) or IRC sections 411(a) and 417(e). This provision allows employers an option to relieve their administrative burdens in connection with the benefits of terminated employees—employers may choose one or more Retirement-USA's to which to make such transfers; at the employer's option employees may also be given a choice—while also extending to such employees the opportunity to have their benefits paid in a retirement income form. The amount transferred may optionally exclude that portion of the vested benefit attributable to nondeductible employee contributions.

An additional rule is triggered in the event the Internal Revenue Code is amended to make distributions subject to an excise tax—which is generally applicable to the distributions made to all participants under a plan who are under a specified age—that is as suggested in the President's tax reform proposal. Only if such an excise tax is enacted, so much of the amount of any such a distribution which would be subject to the excise tax—if such distribution were actually made under such age—would, if a plan sponsor chooses to make such a distribution, be required to be transferred to a Retirement-USA. Of course a plan sponsor would not be required to make such a distribution or transfer except by choice.

Section 103 provides for a general effective date of January 1, 1987—although the qualification of Retirement-USA's could begin within 90 days after the date of enactment.

Title II contains conforming amendments to the Internal Revenue Code.

Section 201 provides for new IRC section 417A containing rules relating to Retirement-USA's. Matching employee contributions described under ERISA section 5202(b)(2) are accorded salary-reduction treatment as described in section 402(a)(8). The excise tax under section 4973 is made applicable to excess participant contributions made to a Retirement-USA. Employer contributions are made deductible under sections 162, 212, and 404 in the same manner as for a defined contribution plan—the section 405(c) limits also apply. The excise tax applicable to age 70½ and certain other distribution rules with respect to IRA's is also made applicable to Retirement-USA's. Generally the prohibited tranaction, borrowing, and security provisions—and related excise tax sanctions—applicable to IRA's are made applicable to Retirement-USA's.

The excise tax for withdrawals under age 59½ applicable to IRA's is extended to Retirement-USA's with the following exceptions—withdrawal of nondeductible employee contributions transferred into a USA, and to the extent the distribution is in the form of a single or joint life annuity. Tax free transfers on a trustee to trustee basis may be made from one Retirment-USA to another—subject to ERISA title V rules. The 10-year forward averaging and capital gains treatment under sections 402(a)(2) and 402(e) are made inapplicable to distributions from a Retirement-USA, except with respect to (A), rollover amounts—as described in section 402(a)(5) and (B), amounts transferred directly from a qualified plan to a Retirement-USA.

Section 202 amends IRC section 402(a) to allow rollover amounts to be transferred to Retirement-USA's.

Section 203 adds a new paragraph (10) to IRC section 402(a) to allow for the portability of nondeductible employee contributions to the extent some or all such contributions are transferred to a Retirment-USA—that is, such a transfer does not disqualify the deductible portion of a distribution from being considered an eligible rollover amount.

Section 204 provides that for tax deduction purposes ERISA section 5202(b)(3) employee contributions to a Retirement-USA be treated in the same manner as contributions to an IRA.

Section 205 provides an excise tax penalty on excess employer contributions.

Section 206 conforms the Internal Revenue Code with respect to the provisions described under section 102.●

THE SECRETARY OF STATE TALKS ABOUT HUMAN RIGHTS AT HELSINKI

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I commend our distinguished Secretary of State, George Shultz, for his eloquent and timely comments about Soviet human rights violations. I have included excerpts from the Secretary's recent address before the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, which met in Helsinki.

While the Soviet Union signed the Helsinki accords 10 years ago, human rights have since suffered in the Soviet Union. Thanks to the cynical attitude of Soviet leaders, the Moscow Helsinki Watch Group has been disbanded and most of its original members are in jail or have been banished. Jewish emigration from that police state has dramatically declined. Refuseniks by the thousands are being harassed by the all-powerful KGB. Overall, there has been no progress in the human rights area in the Soviet Union and in Eastern Bloc countries.

While I fervently hope that the Reagan-Gorbachev meeting this November will be productive and bear fruit, I remain concerned about the fact that the Soviets have little regard for signed agreements. While posturing in the international spotlight as a peace-loving and friendly country, Soviet actions appear to be the real measure of the goals of that country.

With these concerns in mind, I compliment the Secretary for his hard-hitting comments, and recommend them to my colleagues in the House:

SECRETARY OF STATE GEORGE SHULTZ, CSCE TENTH ANNIVERSARY COMMEMORATION ADDRESS, HELSINKI, JULY 30, 1985

The modern political values that underlie our civilization were born in Europe. The belief in human progress, in intellectual freedom, in religious tolerance, in the rights of the individual against the state, and in a peaceful international order—these are the legacies that have been passed on to us by European thought and culture since the Enlightenment. At times, oppression, intolerance, and war have banked the flames of this humane spirit. But always these values have stayed alive, offering hope and inspiration to mankind—that we might explore the outer reaches of knowledge, that we might ascent to a higher plane of human existence, that we might live in peace with our neighbors, that we might have faith in progress and in freedom, for ourselves, and our world.

Today, tragically, Europe is a divided continent. Yet the ideals of European civilization have not been extinguished. They live still in every nation, in every city and village, on every street, in every home, West and East. They bind Europe together. The barriers, the walls, the barbed wire, and the weapons cannot truly divide Europeans from each other or from their heritage. The spiritual strength of European civilization cannot be broken by government-made artifice.

Europe, let us not forget, has been divided before, though never so starkly. Vastly different political systems have lived side by side on this continent for hundreds of years. Empires, constitutional monarchies, and dictatorships have stood beside republics and democracies. Religious wars over the centuries, have caused the deaths of countless innocents. And in this century alone, the people of Europe have endured two world wars that ravaged their continent. Only the heroic efforts of the Western democracies and the Soviet Union saved Europe from Hitler's tyranny. Yet Europe has outlived even these times of trouble.

And the modern idea of liberty, since the eighteenth century, has continued to grow and flourish. It has survived all the historic conflicts and divisions of Europe because, even in the dark moments, the aspiration of individuals to speak, think, and travel freely—throughout the continent—was never extinguished. Belief in the rights of man has deep roots in European philosophy and history.

For now, we all live uneasily with the brutal and artificial division of this continent, even as we search for ways to end it. But nothing in human history has proven irreversible.

• • • • •

And yet, ten years after the signing of the Final Act, no one can deny the gap between hope and performance. Despite the real value of the Final Act as a standard of conduct, the most important promises of a decade ago have not been kept.

Let's look at the specifics.

In the Final Act, we all committed ourselves to treat in a positive and humanitarian way the applications of persons who wish to be reunited with members of their family. Yet, over the past five years, the number of Soviet citizens of Jewish nationality permitted to emigrate, mainly for family reunification, fell from over 51,000 to 896. The regrettable trend is the same for Soviet citizens of German and Armenian nationality.

There are over twenty cases of American/Soviet marriages in which the Soviet spouse has been denied exit permission two or more times, in spite of specific provisions of the Helsinki Final Act. Yury Balovlenkov, who married an American citizen in 1978, was on a hunger strike from March 25 to July 4 protesting six years of continued denial. He has seen only one of his two daughters and is in terribly weakened health.

The Final Act confirms the right of the individual to know and act upon the provisions of the agreement. Yet the citizen's group set up in Moscow to monitor implementation of the Final Act in the Soviet Union disbanded in September 1982 for fear of further persecution. Here is a group of enthusiastic Soviet citizens who were pleased and proud of the decision of their government to sign the Helsinki Final Act. Yet today, Yuriy Orlov, the group's founder, languishes in remote Siberian exile after seven years in a labor camp. Founding member Anatoly Shcharansky, imprisoned on a false charge in 1977, has completed his term in the notorious Chistopel prison and is now serving out the rest of his thirteen-year sentence in one of the most brutal of Soviet labor camps. Imprisoned group member Anatoly Marchenko, currently serving a twelve-year sentence, has been permitted no correspondence with his family for more than a year. Group member Ivan Kovalyov's health has reportedly deteriorated badly since his transfer to labor camp. His wife and fellow group member Tatyana Osipova recently had her own five-year labor camp sentence extended by two years.

The founder of a peace group in Moscow, Sergei Batovrin, was first harassed, them put in a psychiatric ward, and then, when he persisted in advocating peace the way so many thousands of young people do in other countries, he was thrown out of his native land altogether. Other peace activists have met similar fates, as have those struggling for womens' rights and free trade unions. The founders of a Social Democratic party in Moscow were jailed in January of this year.

On June 14, Bogdan Lis, Adam Michnik, and Wladyslaw Frasyniuk were sentenced in Gdansk to terms ranging from two-and-a-half to three-and-a-half years on charges having nothing ostensibly to do with their real "crime" of leading the fight for free trade unionism—a right recognized in the Concluding Document of the Madrid Review meeting. In the Soviet Union, Vladimir Klebanov's efforts to found a free trade union put him in a psychiatric hospital for four years.

Nor has abuse of psychiatric treatment been limited to trade unionists and peace activists. In the Ukraine, Vladimir Khailo, an Evangelical Baptist, has been interned in psychiatric hospitals since 1980 for his faith and his efforts to emigrate with his wife and fifteen children. He has refused an offer of freedom in exchange for renunciation of his faith.

All who would live an active religious life according to their faith, whether Christian, Jewish, or Muslim, risk harassment, imprisonment, or confinement in psychiatric institutions. Baptists, Ukrainian and Lithuanian Catholics, Russian Orthodox, Seventh Day Adventists, and Pentacostals have all been increasingly subject to repression. Dina Shvedsova, Vasyl Kobrin, Father Alfonsas Svarinskas, Father Gleb Yakunin, Pastor Nikolai Goretoi, and Pastor Viktor Valter are only a few of the Christians currently serving sentences of up to twelve years in prison or exile in the Soviet Union because of their faith. A small community of Pentacostals from the village of Chuguevka in the Soviet Far East has suffered grievously in the past several months. Ten community elders have been sentenced to up to five years in labor camp and the rest fired from their jobs. Six families have been threatened with losing custody of their children.

At least sixteen Jewish cultural activists, including nine teachers of the Hebrew language, have been arrested in the Soviet Union since last July, and many have been convicted on obviously trumped-up criminal charges to three to four years of imprisonment and labor camp. Iosif Berenshtein, currently serving a four-year term, was savagely beaten and stabbed while in prison, and lost most of this vision. Yuly Edelshtein, who is serving a three-year term, is reportedly undergoing repreated beatings in his labor camp in Siberia, as part of an effort "to exorcise his religious fanaticism," according to camp authorities.

Abuzakar Rahimov, a Muslim from Tashkent in Soviet Central Asia, was sentenced to seven years in a strict regime labor camp in 1982 for distributing material about the Islamic faith, including translations from the Koran.

Last year in Czechoslovakia, seven priests and nuns were arrested for "obstructing state supervision over churches and religious orders."

Finally, the man who more than any other represents the ideals enshrined in the Final Act—Andrei Sakharov—remains totally isolated from the outside world—in exile, probably still in Gorky. Even as I speak, he may be in a hospital following his most recent hunger strike on behalf of decent medical treatment for his beloved wife. We have reason to believe he was force-fed to break his hunger strike.

We cannot talk about the Helsinki process without talking about human beings, for they are supposed to be the true beneficiaries of the Helsinki Final Act. The fate of these individuals, moreover, affects the actions of thousands, maybe millions, by showing what happens to those who dare exercise their rights and freedoms.

The United States and the Soviet Union have an opportunity to help build a more secure world in the arms control negotiations currently underway in Geneva.

And in November our leaders will meet to examine the whole spectrum of issues before us. We are ready and willing to seize the opportunity. Let our two countries begin the patient, serious work of resolving problems and reaching agreements of benefit to us both, and to other countries as well.

Steps to reduce weapons and enhance security, steps to enhance economic and other exchanges, and steps to relieve the suffering and enrich the lives of individuals—all these reinforce each other. They are part of the same broad program of security and cooperation enshrined in the Helsinki Final Act. Taken together, they could lead us toward a new era in relations in Europe—one that could bring alive once again the promise of Helsinki and the larger promise of European history.

They are not massive or difficult steps to take. But they are important; they have a larger meaning. They require only courage and political will on the part of all of us.●

HIGH TECHNOLOGY ACTIVE BUSINESS ACT OF 1985

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing, together with Mr. GREGG, the High Technology Active Business Act of 1985, a bill that is intended to eliminate the problem of the imposition of the personal holding company penalty tax on small software companies.

Congress has not carefully reviewed the personal holding company rules in many years, and the unintended application of these penalty provisions to high technology companies only recently has come to our attention. In essence, this is a case in which small software companies have been improperly subjected to a penalty tax merely because the personal holding company provisions have failed to keep pace with the fast-changing nature of high technology and the manner in which high technology companies do business.

The personal holding company penalty tax provisions were adopted to prevent the incorporation of passive investment activities in a closely held company, at a time when the corporate tax rates were significantly lower than the top individual rates. By contrast to this "incorporated pocketbook" situation envisioned by Congress in enacting the personal holding company provisions, most software companies clearly are engaged in extensive active business activities on an ongoing basis, including the development of new and improved software products and maintenance and update activities with respect to existing software products. However, because these software companies, being small, are closely held and because of the manner in which the software industry sells its products, these companies are subject to the personal holding company penalty tax. Once developed, the software company's products are transferred to others either by means of a so-called boxtop license to the public—under which the purchaser agrees to the license merely by opening the software's package—or by means of licenses to particular customers, including computer manufacturers. The use of a license is necessary to protect the software company's proprietary interest in the software. Because these sales of software products are by means of licenses, the Revenue Service has taken the position that the resulting software income, characterized as royalties, constitutes personal holding company income, thereby triggering imposition of the 50 percent personal holding company penalty tax in addition to the regular corporate income tax already paid by the software company.

Since the personal holding company provisions were adopted to prevent incorporation of passive investment activities, the application of these provisions to software development companies conducting substantial active, ongoing business operations produces an unintended and extremely harsh result.

Accordingly, the proposed legislation adopts a new exclusion to the definition of personal holding company income for computer software royalties that are earned by a corporation from the active conduct of a trade or buisness. In keeping with the mechanical nature of the personal holding company provisions, the legislation establishes a number of objective, numerical tests for determining whether the corporation in fact is conducting an active business giving rise to the computer software royalty income, thereby offering a much more direct means than present law of distinguishing between active business operations and passive investment activities. These objective tests—which include a number of active business expenditure requirements—are similar to the approach taken in the nearly one dozen other "carve-outs" from personal holding company income that have been enacted by Congress through the years for various other types of active businesses that have become entangled in the personal holding company provisions because of the changing way in which they do business.

The proposed computer software royalties exclusion applies in general to royalties attributable to computer software that has been developed, manufactured, or produced by the corporation in connection with a trade or business. An active business, for purposes of the proposed exclusion, will be deemed to exist only if the total R&D and ordinary business expenses properly attributable to the business activities generating the computer software royalty income exceed a substantial specified percentage of the corporation's income. Qualifying business expenditures for this purpose do not include compensation for personal services of major shareholders. by requiring that R&D and other proper business expenses be significant as a percentage of the corporation's income, the test distinguishes active business operations from the passive investment repository of the "incorporated pocketbook" situation. In the "incorporated pocketbook" situation, it is unlikely that the corporation would be able to reinvest such a substantial portion of the royalty income in the active conduct of the same trade or business or to generate significant amounts of proper business expenses other than compensation of the major shareholders. Similarly, by so excluding the compensation of major shareholders, the proposed active business royalties exclusion avoids the "one-man corporation" concern by in effect requiring that the corporation's business activities extend well beyond merely the efforts of such major shareholders. Finally, the proposed exclusion is unavailable if the corporation has more than a minimal amount of other forms of personal holding company income, thereby providing further assurance that the exclusion will be applicable only to truly active software businesses.

The proposed exclusion for computer software royalties derived from the active conduct of a trade or business would be generally effective for taxable years ending after the date of enactment. However, the legislation also is intended to clarify the proper treatment of computer software royalties under present law for purposes of the personal holding company provisions.

The proposed legislation includes an additional provision that eliminates code section 174 R&D expenses as a preference item, for minimum tax purposes, in the case of personal holding companies. Under present law, R&D expenses are not a preference item for corporations other than personal holding companies. This provision of the proposed legislation addresses the following problem. If the startup high technology company constitutes a personal holding company because of the interest income generated on its venture capital balances during the startup phase, the company's loss carryforwards will be tainted such that, in future years when the loss carryforwards are offset against operating profits, the company will be subject to a minimum tax liability on 90 percent of the R&D that had been expensed in the taxable years in which the loss carryforwards were generated. Thus, this provision of the proposed legislation is merely making a technical correction of what clearly is an unintended result of the 1982 Tax Act.

The revenue effect of the proposed legislation should be very limited. Total actual collections of personal holding company tax from all corporations in all industries in recent years have been in the range of $3 to $5 million annually.

I believe that the proposed legislation provides a fair and carefully circumscribed solution to these very pressing problems of small software companies and startup high technology companies. I expect the bill to be noncontroversial and would hope that it can be promptly enacted.

The text of the bill follows:

H.R. —

A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 with respect to the treatment under the personal holding company provisions of computer software royalties earned by active businesses and the treatment under the minimum tax provisions of research or experimental expenditures of personal holding companies, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SEC. 1. SHORT TITLE; ETC.

(a) SHORT TITLE.—This act may be cited as the "High Technology Active Business Act of 1985".

(b) AMENDMENT OF THE 1954 CODE.—Except as otherwise expressly provided, whenever in this Act an amendment or repeal is expressed in terms of an amendment to, or repeal of, a section or other provision, the reference shall be considered to be made to a section or other provision of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, as amended.

SEC. 2. TREATMENT FOR PERSONAL HOLDING COMPANY TAX PURPOSES OF COMPUTER SOFTWARE ROYALTIES DERIVED BY ACTIVE BUSINESSES.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—

(1) Paragraph (1) of section 543(a) (defining personal holding company income) is amended by striking the word "and" at the end of subparagraph (A), by striking the period at the end of subparagraph (B) and inserting in lieu thereof the words ", and", and by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph (C):

"(C) computer software royalties derived from the active conduct of a trade or business (as provided in subsection (b)(5)) by the corporation."

(2) Subsection (b) of section 543 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph (5):

"(5) COMPUTER SOFTWARE ROYALTIES FROM ACTIVE BUSINESS.—For purposes of subsection (a)(1)(C), computer software royalties will be treated as derived from the active conduct of a trade or business by the corporation if—

"(A) the royalties are attributable to (i) computer software that is developed, manufactured, or produced (in whole or in substantial part) by the corporation (or its predecessor) in connection with a trade or business or (ii) computer software that is distributed by the corporation in carrying on a trade or business but only if the corporation otherwise is carrying on the trade or business or developing, manufacturing, or producing computer software,

"(B) computer software royalties constitute 50 percent or more of the ordinary gross income of the corporation,

"(C) the sum of the deductions which are properly allocable to the same trade or business of the corporation as the amounts described in subparagraph (A) and which—

"(i) are allowable under section 174 (relating to research or experimental expenditures),

"(iii) would be allowable under section 162 but for the application of section 195 (relating to start-up expenditures).

other than compensation for personal services rendered by the fewest number of individual shareholders among those described in section 542(a)(2) (as determined without regard to stock considered as owned by the shareholder solely by attribution from a partner under section 544(a)(2)) whose combined ownership interest exceeds 50 percent in value of the outstanding stock of the corporation, equals or exceeds 25 percent of the ordinary gross income of the corporation, and

"(D) the sum of—

"(i) the dividends paid during the taxable year (determined under section 562),

"(ii) the dividends considered as paid on the last day of the taxable year under section 563(c) (as limited by the second sentence of section 563(b)), and

"(iii) the consent dividends for the taxable year (determined under section 565), equals or exceeds the amount, if any, by which the personal holding company income for the taxable year (computed (I) without regard to amounts described in subsection (a)(1)(C), to interest during any taxable year in which the corporation is subject to the provisions of section 195 and otherwise meets the requirements of this paragraph, or to dividends from any corporation in which the taxpayer owns at least 50 percent of all classes of stock entitled to vote and at least 50 percent of the total value of all classes of stock and which meets the requirements of this paragraph (except that the royalties derived by such corporation may be attributable to computer software that has been developed, manufactured, or produced by the taxpayer in the manner described in subparagraph (A)), and (II) by including as personal holding company income the adjusted income from rents and from mineral, oil, and gas royalties) exceeds 10 percent of the ordinary gross income of the corporation.

"For purposes of this paragraph, any costs of developing computer software that are not properly treated as research or experimental expenditures (as defined in section 174) shall be treated as amounts for which deductions are allowable under section 162 or as amounts for which deductions would be allowable under section 162 but for the application of section 195. A corporation that otherwise fails to satisfy the requirement in subparagraph (C) for the taxable year nevertheless will be treated as satisfying such requirement for the taxable year if the average sum of the deductions referred to in subparagraph (C) (as adjusted for major shareholder compensation) equals or exceeds 25 percent of the average ordinary gross income of the corporation for each year of a period consisting of the taxable year and the four immediately preceding taxable years; provided that if the corporation has not been in existence for one or more of the four immediately preceding taxable years, the five-year computation period shall consist of the taxable year, those of the four immediately preceding taxable years during which the corporation was in existence, and such of the years immediately succeeding the taxable year as are necessary to complete the five-year computation period."

(b) FOREIGN PERSONAL HOLDING COMPANY INCOME.—Paragraph (1) of section 553(a) (defining foreign personal holding company income) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "This paragraph shall not apply to royalties described in section 543(b)(5) (without regard to subparagraph (A) thereof) that are received by a corporation in respect of computer software that has been developed, manufactured, or produced (in whole or in substantial part) in connection with the active conduct of a trade or business (as determined under sections 543(a)(1)(C) and 543(b)(5)) by such corporation or by a member of the same affiliated group of corporations (as defined in section 1504(a) without regard to section 1504(b)(3)) as the corporation."

(c) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—Paragraph (4) of section 543(a) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "This paragraph shall not apply to royalties described in paragraph (1)(C)."

(d) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to all taxpayers years ending after the date of enactment of this Act.

SEC. 3. ELIMINATION OF RESEARCH OR EXPERIMENTAL EXPENDITURES AS A MINIMUM TAX PREFERENCE ITEM FOR PERSONAL HOLDING COMPANIES.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—The last sentence of section 57(a) (defining items of tax preference) is amended by inserting immediately before the period at the end thereof the following words: ", and paragraph (6) to the extent it relates to amounts allowable as a deduction under section 174(a) also shall not apply to a personal holding company (as so defined)."

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1982.●

RESTRICTING THE DISTRIBUTION OF HANDGUNS

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, the terrible proliferation of easily obtainable handguns continues to reap a harvest of death. More than 10,000 Americans die each year because of these weapons, largely because of insufficient gun control. This is a national shame, and I rise to commend the efforts of Congressman PETER RODINO, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee. He has worked to restrict the availability of small caliber weapons.

Congressman RODINO has offered a bill which asks for a reasonable waiting period whereby a prospective handgun purchaser would be required to wait until local law enforcement officers checked his criminal records. In this way, the acquisition of firearms would be much less arbitrary than it is now. The Rodino bill is an excellent step in the right direction.

Chairman RODINO has an admirable record in safeguarding the rights and civil liberties of Americans. He is to be congratulated for his fine efforts. I submit the following article written by Mr. RODINO for inclusion in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the Washington Post, July 23, 1985]

THE SENATE UNDER THE HANDGUN

(Peter W. Rodino, Jr.)

If Congress really wants to fight crime, emasculating controls on the interstate sale of handguns surely is not the way to do it. But that is exactly what the Senate did recently with the passage of a bill that will render toothless the minimal gun control laws we now have on the books. What these laws need is strengthening, not weakening.

Considering the grim statistics on handgun crime in America, the Senate's action is surprising. In 1980, there were more than 11,000 handgun murders in the United States—as compared to four in Australia, eight in Great Britain and eight in Canada, each of which has a tough handgun control law. In 1983 handguns were used in 200,000 robberies and 120,000 aggravated assaults, and accounted for 44 percent of all murders. Even more alarming is the fact that while the Vietnam war claimed 46,121 American lives in the decade from 1963 to 1973, handgun murders killed more than 70,000 civilians back home in America.

But statistics cannot tell the whole story. Behind the numbers are thousands of personal tragedies, grieving families and shattered futures, brought about solely by reckless use of handguns by criminals. Our national memory is equally scarred by handgun-welding assassins taking aim at our political leaders. Fortunately, presidents Reagan and Ford, as well as Gov. George Wallace, survived handgun attempts on their lives. Presidential Press Secretary James Brady barely did. Robert Kennedy, Allard Lowenstein and George Moscone did not.

Sadly, murder by handgun has become, in the words of one London newspaper, "a peculiarly American death."

So why did the Senate approve the bill weakening controls? Ostensibly to help out-of-state hunters and sportsmen who want easier access to weapons. But hunters have no use for handguns such as the easily concealed, snub-nosed "Saturday night special." Only criminals do. Loosening restrictions on such weapons defies reason.

While no one wants to inconvenience hunters and sportsmen, at the same time we don't want to make it easier for criminals, drug addicts, felons and mental incompetents to get their hands on a handgun. But with the bill passed by the Senate, all a criminal has to do is cross a state line and the snub-nosed gun is his.

It's no surprise that every major police or organization opposes this bill. Last year, two-thirds of the American police officers who died in the line of duty were killed by handguns. A bill that would loosen restrictions—making it easier for criminals to purchase a handgun—can only add to the crime rate and increase the chance that murder, robbery and other violent crimes will jeopardize more lives.

There is a clear consensus in America that crime must be reduced. Last year Congress passed the Comprehensive Crime Control Act with just that purpose. One of its provisions called for strict prison sentences for persons who commit crimes while carrying firearms. What we really need are laws to prevent these crimes from happening initially—after-the-fact prison sentences do little for the victims of crime. The Senate bill, however, only makes the fight against crime more difficult by affording potential criminals greater opportunity to commit a violent crime. Instead of giving law enforcement officials more tools to fight crime, this bill would end up giving criminals more tools to commit crimes.

Public opinion polls indicate that an overwhelming majority of Americans favors tougher gun control laws. So did the attorney general's 1981 Task Force on Violent Crime, which recommended a mandatory waiting period to enable law enforcement agencies to check the records of a prospective purchaser of a firearm.

To that end, I recently introduced legislation that calls for a reasonable waiting period. State and local laws with waiting periods have been highly effective: for example, two felons per week are prevented from buying handguns in Columbus, Ga., and in 1981, 1,200 felons were screened out in California. (In fact, had such a law been in place, John Hinckley might have been prevented from purchasing the handgun he used in his assassination attempt on President Reagan.)

A 1981 Gallup poll showed that 91 percent of Americans favor just such a waiting period. Americans are serious about fighting crime.

In America, we enact tough laws against drunk drivers and speeders because they cause highway deaths. We pass laws that crack down on drugs because they cause death and violent crime. Yet, if the bill passed by the Senate ever becomes law, we will be giving a free pass to criminals to purchase a gun.

For years opponents of gun control legislation have used the tired argument that guns don't kill, people do. But if the Senate's bill passes the House, more of the people who are likely to kill will find it easier to get their hands on a gun. It just doesn't make any sense.●

KEEPING SOUTH AFRICA IN PERSPECTIVE

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, just over a week ago the Government of South Africa imposed a state of emergency in response to widespread unrest and rioting within the black community. That decision has been roundly criticised not only here in the United States but in the United Nations and in various foreign countries as well. But before rushing to judge the propriety of that action, I think that my colleagues here in this body would do well to remember several salient facts.

First, the state of emergency was imposed only after nearly 11 months of ongoing violence in black residential areas. Most of the rioting has been perpetrated by youths between the ages of 10 and 16. They have burned down schools, administration buildings, and houses. Cars, delivery vehicles, buses, and trains have all been stoned and set on fire, and businesses have been looted and burned. In this time period, more than $16 million worth of fixed property has been destroyed, and more than $6 million worth of motor vehicles and trains have also been destroyed.

Second, despite the impressions given by the press in this country, the violence has been largely black on black. More than 100 black town councilors have been attacked by black mobs, and more than 70 of these have also had their homes and businesses destroyed. Any black in a position of responsibility is in danger of being attacked, and many community leaders have been mutilated and set on fire in the streets. Black policemen and soldiers are favorite targets, with the homes of more than 360 black policemen having been razed in just over a year.

Third, while it is true that apartheid is abhorrent, we continue to focus only on South Africa, and not to any of the Eastern bloc countries that systematically abuse the human rights of their citizens, nor on any of the other African nations with human rights records far more tarnished than that of South Africa. Uganda, Angola, Zimbabwe, and numerous other black African states live in a perpetual "state of emergency," yet no protests are carried out in front of their Embassies, and no sanctions are imposed. Instead, we send them aid and maintain a business-as-usual policy toward them.

Many of South Africa's critics have claimed that the state of emergency was declared to suppress legitimate protest and to take the place of real reform. But this attitude denies the real situation within South Africa. Before condemning South Africa, each of us should ask ourselves the following questions. What would our response be if faced with the unrest that exists now in South Africa's black townships? If black violence reached the epidemic levels in this country that it has reached in South Africa—some 150 blacks murdered by other blacks—would we not act to bring an end to that violence? I daresay we would, and we would do so swiftly. Thus it is hard for me to condemn South Africa for acting as it has.

Along these same lines, I commend to my colleagues attention an editorial that recently appeared in the Washington Times. I think it is worthy of our attention.

The editorial follows:

SOUTH AFRICA IN PERSPECTIVE

With South Africa aflame, it's natural to think about what might arise from the ashes. An idealistic view—that once apartheid is overturned, a more democratic government will follow—is common among Americans who protest South African policies. They are justified in opposing apartheid, but wrong to assume that it is the sole evil in Africa, or even the greatest one.

In fact, South Africa is not the only nation on the continent in an official state of emergency. In Zimbabwe, parliament two weeks ago renewed a state of emergency, which allows it a freer hand in fighting opponents of Robert Mugabe's one-party state. Renewal was no surprise: the vote was 63-24, and Mr. Mugabe's Zimbabwe African National Union holds 63 of 100 seats. Opposing the measure was somewhat risky, since Justice Minister Eddison Zvobgo said anyone voting against extending the emergency would be seen as supporting the rebels.

There are worse places to be. Ethiopia, where brutal policies have teamed up with natural deficiencies to create famine, comes to mind. The Mengistu regime is nearly off limits for criticims, the fear being that if it becomes angry at donor nations, less food might be distributed to the starving. Mr. Mengistu holds his own countrymen hostage, his policies have led to innumerable deaths, yet he takes little heat.

In Uganda, it's as if Idi Amin never left. Some say it's worse, and last week's coup doesn't promise to be a liberating experience. Who wants to live in Mozambique? Angola? The Sudan? How about Libya? Few people courting arrest at the South African Embassy would. It's doubtful how many of them would dare get arrested if they weren't assured of being released in time for dinner.

The government of South Africa must share power with black leaders who are opposed to violence. It is equally important to realize that tyrants come in all colors, and that even relatively smooth transfers of power in Africa are often followed by regimes much worse than the one running South Africa. Americans should become more aware of this recurring phenomenon, especially those who have made the cause of black South Africans their own.●

TRIBUTE TO R.T. HANNA

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, this year, Chief R.T. Hanna, assistant commander of the central division of the California Highway Patrol, will retire after more than 28 years of service to the people of California.

Chief Hanna was born in Bakersfield, and attended schools in the Bakersfield area. After having graduated from Bakersfield College, he served with the Navy in the South Pacific during World War II. Hanna spent 12 years after his discharge from the Navy working as a mechanic for the Kern County Union High School District. In 1957, after having graduated from the California Highway Patrol Academy, he began his career with the CHP. He began by performing road patrol, commercial enforcement, and special duty assignments in the Bakersfield area.

In 1965, Hanna was promoted to the rank of sergeant and for the next 6 years served as the sergeant in charge of the Wheeler Ridge inspection facility. In 1971 he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant, and served as the field operations officer in the Indio area. The next year Hanna was transferred to Fresno, and he served as the zone administrative lieutenant for the next 4 years. After being assigned to the CHP's Office of Internal Affairs in Sacramento, he was promoted to the rank of captain in 1976. The next year Hanna was assigned commander of the Fresno area. In 1980, he was appointed assistant commander of the central division, the position which Chief Hanna holds today.

Over the past four decades, R.T. Hanna has been a strong and dedicated servant of his country during World War II, his community as a mechanic with the Kern County Union School District, and his State as a leader in the California Highway Patrol. Chief Hanna has worked especially hard to make the highways of central California safe and efficient, and for that we are all grateful to him. I would like to thank Chief Hanna for his many years of dedicated public service, and I wish him much happiness in his retirement.●

A SALUTE TO JOHN M. TOUPS

HON. FRANK R. WOLF

OF VIRGINIA

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, on September 7, 1985, the Virginia Community Foundation's Founders Award will be presented to John M. Toups, businessman and resident of McLean, VA, at a dinner at the Hyatt Regency Hotel in Crystal City, VA.

The Northern Virginia Community Foundation was formed in 1978 by a group of northern Virginia residents who wanted "to return to the community some of the riches that they had received from it." Five areas of concern benefit from the foundation's endowment funds: The arts, education, health, youth and civic improvement.

The foundation receives charitable gifts from people from all walks of life with all levels of income—families, business, national corporations, and foundations. Donations are used exclusively to benefit northern Virginia.

Each year, the foundation honors a citizen of northern Virginia who has made an unusual contribution to the life and prosperity of the community. The award is made to recognize the unselfish efforts of that individual and to promote awareness of the significance of individual action in improving the quality of life for all members of the community.

This year, John M. Toups, chairman, president and chief executive officer of Planning Research Corp., has been chosen to receive the 1985 Founders Award. In a few short years in northern Virginia, John Toups has made his leadership and influence felt in supporting the business community, in improving technical higher education, in supporting locally developed cultural activities and in helping to solve the area's transportation problems.

John Toups is a member of the board of directors of the Fairfax County Chamber of Commerce, the Fairfax Symphony, the George Mason Institute Industrial Policy Board, the Tysons Transportation Association, the Washington Dulles Task Force and Fairfax County Neighborhood Watch/Crime Prevention Education, Inc. He has chaired and served on numerous committees and programs in northern Virginia and in the Greater Washington area. He is president of the Professional Services Council, vice president of the National Security Industrial Association and a director of the national Committee for Employer Support of Veterans Employment and of the Greater Washington Board of Trade.

He has helped his company become a significant factor for development and social commitment in the northern Virginia community. PRC officers and employees work on business, health, youth, educational, and cultural programs throughout the area, and the PRC building is opened to numerous community activities.

John Toups combines professional skills as a registered engineer with entrepreneurial skills as a businessman. When Toups Corp., a hydrology and land development engineering firm of which he was founder and president, was acquired by Planning Research Corp. in 1970, he became a PRC vice president. The company quickly recognized his abilites, and he became a PRC director in 1973, president in 1978 and chairman in 1982. Under John Toups' leadership, the international professional services company has grown from $280 million in revenue in 1980 to $375 million in 1985.

While its headquarters were still in Los Angeles, CA, PRC opened its first offices in McLean, VA, in 1970. John Toups moved the corporate headquarters from Washington, DC, to PRC's showcase building in the new Tysons/McLean development in 1981. PRC is now the third largest employer in northern Virginia, with more than 1,400 employees in McLean and Dulles, VA, and 7,500 employees worldwide.

Community leaders in northern Virginia also have quickly recognized not only John Toups ability, but also his dedication to the well-being of his neighbors and his community. His friends, colleagues, and associates are inspired by his intelligence, integrity and leadership in working to solve the community's problems and to enrich the lives of its citizens.

John M. Toups is a uniquely deserving recipient of the northern Virginia foundation's Founders Award.●

A LOOK TO CANADA FOR HEALTH CARE

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, during a recent visit to Canada, Ms. Maggie Kuhn, founder and national convener of the Gray Panthers, and Mr. Robert Weiner, former staff director of the House Select Committee on Aging, were impressed by the success of their national health system and its potential in the United States. In contrast with the United States, in Canada no one single Canadian is denied important health services for lack of ability to pay; hospital stays are free to everyone; and doctor visits are free to everyone.

I believe my colleagues who are seeking solutions to the high cost of health care would benefit from reading the following paper prepared by these two distinguished senior citizen representatives. For this reason, I would like to insert at this point in the RECORD, in its entirety, the article entitled "Universal Health Care: Canada Has It, Why Can't We?"

UNIVERSAL HEALTH CARE: CANADA HAS IT, WHY CAN'T WE?

(By Maggie Kuhn, Founder and National Convener, Gray Panthers, and Robert S. Weiner, Former Staff Director, U.S. House of Representatives Committee on Aging)

During a recent week-long visit to Canada, Gray Panthers were struck by three basic facts of the Canadian health care system:

(1) Not a single Canadian is denied important health services for lack of ability to pay.

(2) Hospital stays are free to everyone.

(3) Doctor visits are free to everyone.

We went to Canada to learn, and learn we did. We learned the amazing contrast of the philosophy of our neighbor to the North that health care must be and is free and universal, whereas in the United States, where we often mistakenly believe we have the best health system around, thirty-five million people—15 percent of our population—lack health insurance coverage, according to the Census Bureau.

The Canadian system has been in place since 1969. Under its laws, every person has the right to receive adequate, continuous and personal health services and social services without financial or other barriers.

Of the world's industrialized nations, only two remain without a universal health plan—the United States and South Africa. The irony is overwhelming. In many ways, the deaths that occur from people being dumped from hospital to hospital for lack of payment are as unconscionable as apartheid itself.

The pride we take in the science and efficiency of our own system is false when we realize that we are not even among the world's top five nations in infant mortality or longevity/life span, two key indicators at both ends of the age spectrum.

Americans will justifiably ask key questions of the viability of the Canadian system. For example, how is it paid for? What do the doctors think? Isn't this "socialized medicine"?

The Canadian system is run under federal law by each of the provinces (states), with each province taxing three percent of salaries, matched by three percent from employers, and both matched by an equal six percent from the national government. It started as a single province's (Saskatchewan) plan and was so successful that the country adopted it. Canada's costs per patient average $309 less annually than identical services in the United States, largely because of the efficiency of a universal system. Doctors bill the government for each patient rather than billing the patients themselves.

While there was a flurry of opposition at first by doctors, with some of the less successful ones leaving the country, physicians now are very satisfied, according to the many doctors and others with whom we spoke. Canadian physicians remain among the highest paid persons in society. And no, the word "socialized" is not used for medicine in Canada because health care there, like education, is considered a right, not a privilege.

Granted, under the Reagan administration, a national health service in our country is not likely to occur. But it is an idea long overdue. It is unconscionable that as we move this summer to celebrate social security's fiftieth birthday, the elderly are paying a higher percentage of their income now for health care than when Medicare, one of social security's major ingredients, was created. Medicare only covers forty percent of health care costs, and a Medicare recipient now has to pay over $400 of his or her own money for a hospital stay.

The Canadian system is by no means perfect. Because the system is provincially based, some specific services such as dental, optical, hearing and foot care vary by province. Also, some doctors attempt to overbill beyond the federal guidelines, and two provinces permit this action. In addition, services are not always available. The overcrowding we saw in some hospital emergency rooms was alarming, with beds stacked up in the halls. However, even this fact means that people have needed to use the system, and the system can be improved. Doctors, patients, and administrators with whom we talked agreed that Canada's sixteen-year-old law has dramatically improved access to health care in the nation.

We should at least try to have individual states in the United States pioneer a similar plan, as Canada's provinces first did before the national program went into effect. Gray Panthers across the nation will be asking Congress to support such states' pilot plans.

History can be made in our lifetime. On this last frontier, health care, it is time we caught up to the rest of the world.●

HIRING THE HANDICAPPED IN THE FEDERAL WORKFORCE

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation which will encourage the hiring of handicapped individuals by the Federal Government. As chairwoman of the Subcommittee on Civil Service, I strongly support equal employment opportunities. It's terribly important that all individuals who want to work for the Federal Government have the opportunity to do so. Disabled Americans can and do perform with excellence in the Federal Government.

My bill would make two basic changes in law: First, under current law, agencies are authorized to hire personal assistants for handicapped employees. This bill would ensure that personal assistants are not counted as part of the agency's personnel ceiling. Many personal assistants perform other tasks as well; so the bill would just exempt from the ceiling that proportion of the time spent on personal assistant duties.

Second, current law provides that success in meeting equal employment opportunity must be an element of an employee's performance appraisal standards. The bill would provide that success in hiring the handicapped would also be part of this requirement. While this provision should heighten awareness of bringing the disabled into Government service, it is not intended to weaken the current EEO laws relating to minorities and women.

There is a selective placement system in Federal agencies which deals with the planning and implementation of affirmative action for handicapped individuals. This program is staffed by selective placement coordinators who are responsible for providing direct services to handicapped individuals, bringing applicants and selecting officials together, keeping track of the types of positions agency managers and supervisors have to fill, and being up to date on rehabilitation organizations and services that can help solve problems when necessary. Linking performance standards to equal employment opportunity and affirmative action and specifically to programs dealing with the handicapped should start a cascade effect.

By holding managers and supervisors accountable for their success in hiring disabled citizens, we will encourage managers to consider whether each vacancy could be filled by a handicapped individual. This action alone should multiply the number of job opportunities there are for the handicapped in the Federal Government.

This idea will also greatly assist our overworked rehabilitation counselors. Certification of handicapped individuals will receive greater attention. Federal employees will be contacting counselors on a regular basis to advise them of job vacancies in their agencies. Handicapped individuals will no longer have to walk the pavement and bang on doors to have the opportunity to secure a job with the Federal Government.

While the two provisions of this bill are rather modest, they could go a long way toward making a career with the Federal Government a real possibility for disabled Americans.

The text of the bill follows:

H.R. —

A bill to amend title 5, United States Code, to encourage the employment of handicapped individuals by the Federal Government

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 3102 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(f) Any individual employed as a personal assistant under this section shall not be counted for purposes of any personnel ceiling administered by the Office of Management and Budget or any other agency.".

(b) Section 4302a(c)(1)(B)(v) of title 5, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"(v) meeting affirmative action goals and achievement of equal employment opportunity requirements (including employment of handicapped employees, as defined in section 3102(a)(2) of this title);".

(c) Section 4313(5) of title 5, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"(5) meeting affirmative action goals and achievement of equal employment opportunity requirements (including employment of handicapped employees, as defined in section 3102(a)(2) of this title).".●

CONFERENCE ON SECURITY AND COOPERATION IN EUROPE

HON. TOBY ROTH

OF WISCONSIN

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, in view of the approach of the 10th anniversary of the signing of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, I commend to the attention of my colleagues an article written by the Council of Free Czechoslovakia brought to my attention by Mojmir Povolny, president and chairman of the council:

STATEMENT BY THE COUNCIL OF FREE CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The Council of Free Czechoslovakia commends all the free and democratic governments of Europe and the governments succeeded ten years ago in including in the Final Act of Helsinki Principles I (Sovereign equality, respect for the right inherent in sovereignty), VI (Non-intervention in internal affairs), VII (Respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, including the freedom of thought, conscience, religion or belief), and VIII (Equal rights and self-determination of peoples) as well as, and especially, of the entire section on Cooperation in Humanitarian and Other Fields. The Council of Free Czechoslovakia wishes to commend the same governments for their uncompromising defense in the review sessions of the conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe of those signatories of the provisions dealing with Cooperation in Humanitarian and Other Fields in general and with human rights and fundamental freedoms in particular. The Council of Free Czechoslovakia is especially grateful for the firm stand taken by the representatives of the same governments at the recent Ottawa Human Rights Experts' Meeting of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe.

The Council of Free Czechoslovakia, however, reminds the same governments that in spite of the commitments assumed by the communist government of Czechoslovakia under the Final Act and in spite of their efforts to influence the conduct of the Czechoslovak government the violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms by the Czechoslovak authorities have continued unabated. Those who in Czechoslovakia have tried to monitor the observation by the Czechoslovak government of the human rights provisions of the Final Act have been persecuted, arrested, and incarcerated. The signatories of Charter 77 and the members of the Committee for the Defense of the Unjustly Persecuted (VONS) have lost their jobs, many have been sentenced for their advocacy of human rights to serve years in prison, their children have been denied admission to institutions of higher education, and many have been simply exiled from their own country. The persecution of churches and of religious believers, of priests and ministers as well as of laymen, in Czechoslovakia is so severe that it has no parallel anywhere even in communist ruled Central and Eastern Europe and can be compared only to the persecution of the churches in Czechoslovakia in the late 1940's and early 1950's. The restrictions imposed by the Czechoslovak government upon the freedom of travel of Czechoslovak citizens run counter to and make a mockery of the corresponding provisions of the Final Act.

The essential issue in Czechoslovakia, however, is the violation of Principles I, VI, and VIII of the Final Act—the continuing occupation of Czechoslovakia by the Soviet armed forces and the denial of the fundamental freedom of the Czechoslovak citizens to be governed by a government of their free choice.

The Council of Free Czechoslovakia appeals, therefore, to the free and democratic signatories of the Final Act that on the solemn occasion of the tenth anniversary of the signing of the Final Act as well as in all future review sessions and meetings of Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe:

(1) They insist on the unabiguous observation by all the Czechoslovak authorities of the obligations and pledges undertaken in the Final Act and concerning human rights and fundamental freedoms of all Czechoslovak citizens;

(2) They request the guaranteed freedom of the Czechoslovak citizens, through their own appropriate non-governmental organization or organizations, to monitor this observation and to report on it to the conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe;

(3) They insist on the termination of Czechoslovakia's occupation by the Soviet armed forces and on Soviet non-intervention in Czechoslovak internal affairs;

(4) They encourage and pursue such an evaluation of international relations in Europe that would make possible a free and complete expression by the Czechoslovak people of their right of self-determination including the right ot neutrality.

The Council of Free Czechoslovakia address this appeal to the free and democratic governments of Europe and to the governments of the United States of America and of Canada in the most sincere and solemn conviction that the fulfillment of its request would make a signal contribution to freedom, peace, security, justice, and cooperation in Europe.●

MERCHANT MARINE ACT, 1936, AMENDMENTS

HON. NORMAN F. LENT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing, by request, legislation to amend the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, to authorize the foreign acquisition of subsidized U.S.-flag vessels. This legislation was transmitted to Congress on April 2, 1985, by Secretary of Transportation Elizabeth H. Dole. Two of my colleagues, the chairman of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, Mr. Jones, and the ranking minority member of the Merchant Marine Subcommittee, Mr. SNYDER, join with me in introducing this bill.

This Nation's merchant marine is suffering through some very difficult times. The number of commercial merchant vessels in our fleet has been steadily declining. The operators of both the liner fleet as well as our liquid and dry-bulk vessels are having trouble securing adequate cargoes. The cost of constructing commercial ships in the United States has steadily gone up to the point where we have virtually priced ourselves out of the world market. It is not possible to build a vessel in the United States and have that ship be competitive with foreign operators. U.S. operators who have their vessels in international commerce are competing against foreign operators who are benefiting from Government construction subsidies and other forms of governmental assistance.

This legislation is intended to address one aspect of the problems facing the operators of the big liner vessels. The legislation proposes that section 615 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, originally approved in 1981, be amended to give the Secretary of Transportation permanent authority to authorize U.S.-flag operators receiving an operating-differential subsidy to construct or acquire vessels outside the United States. While the leadership of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee does not necessarily agree with everything in this legislation, we do believe that it is a starting point from which the Congress can proceed in the development of legislation that would provide some benefit to our maritime industry.

This legislative proposal does not provide answers for all of the problems facing our maritime industry, in fact its scope is rather narrow. There will undoubtedly be those who oppose this legislation, arguing that it will cause harm to other sectors of our maritime industry—particularly the shipbuilding industry. In these difficult fiscal times, however, we need to be honest about what the Federal Government can do to help all sectors of our economy. It may not be possible, for example, to maintain a U.S. presence in the international shipping trade and, at the same time, continue to provide unlimited assistance to the U.S. shipyards. We may have to look at other alternatives rather than requiring U.S. operators on subsidy to use U.S.-built ships in the international trade. The cost impact of such a requirement—increased capital cost to the vessel operators, increased charges for shipping for transporting goods, and increased prices for U.S. consumers—may make this requirement unworkable.

Included with the executive communication from the Department of Transportation was a statement of purpose and need that was prepared by the Department to describe this proposed legislation. I have attached that document to my remarks for the benefit of my colleagues.

STATEMENT OF PURPOSE AND NEED

For a draft bill "To amend the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, to authorize the foreign acquisition of subsidized U.S.-flag vessels."

The draft bill would amend the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, to provide authority for subsidized U.S.-flag ship operators to construct or acquire vessels outside the United States and still receive operating-differential subsidies (ODS). Since the enactment of the Merchant Marine Act in 1936, ODS vessels have been required to be constructed in the United States. Such vessels were generally built with the aid of construction-differential subsidy (CDS). In order to assist subsidized operators in meeting their contractual obligations to replace overaged ships, section 1610 of Public Law 97-35 (approved August 13, 1981) added a section 615 to the Merchant Marine Act that generally authorized the acquisition of foreign-built vessels for subsidized U.S.-flag service in the absence of available CDS until the end of FY 1983. However, restrictions placed on this authority for FY 1983 mean that, for all practical purposes, the authority provided by section 615 was available only in FY 1982. Thereafter, section 134 of Public Law 98-151 (approved November 14, 1983) authorized the Secretary to permit two subsidized U.S.-flag operators to acquire a total of six existing foreign-built vessels.

Rather than continue such ad hoc approach, the draft bill would amend section 615 to continue to authorize U.S.-flag operators to construct or acquire vessels outside the United States and still receive ODS. It would also clarify current authority under section 615 to acquire existing vessels outside the United States to be reflagged and made eligible to receive ODS. However, funds from the Capital Construction Fund provided by section 607 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, could not be used for this purpose.

Section 615 authority would be effective upon a determination by the Secretary that the foreign-built vessel is over 5,000 DWT and would be suitable for use by the Federal government for national defense or military purposes in time of war or national emergency. This provision would allow replacement of overaged vessels to continue on schedule and thus avert a decline in the size of the U.S.-flag liner fleet, which is the primary U.S. source of military sealift capability.

When documented under U.S. registry, subsidized vessels constructed or acquired under proposed section 615, or previous "build-foreign" legislation enacted as section 1610 of Public Law 97-35, would be eligible to transport reserved cargoes subject to the Cargo Preference Act of 1954. This is one element of the Administration's proposal to amend the current three year waiting period of the Cargo Preference Act of 1954, for foreign-built vessels, whether subsidized or not, so that modern, foreign-built vessels with national security utility would be immediately eligible to transport such cargoes.

Finally, section 3704 of title 46 generally requires U.S. construction of certain specified antipollution fixtures on a vessel for coastwise operation. The draft bill would continue to waive this requirement for previously U.S.-built vessels installing such features in a foreign yard under proposed section 615 or Public Law 97-35.●

INTRODUCTION OF A BILL WHICH WOULD CLARIFY THE TAXATION OF EMPLOYEE AWARDS

HON. WILLIAM M. THOMAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today legislation to amend the Internal Revenue Code with respect to the taxation of employee awards. This bill would clarify the tax treatment of employee awards to the employee-recipients.

Present law—section 274 (b)(1)(C) and (b)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code, as amended by ERTA—allows an employer to deduct up to $400, and in the case of qualified plan awards, up to $1,600, of the cost of employee achievement awards; that is, items of tangible personal property awarded by reason of an employee's length of service, productivity, or safety achievement. It is clear that the intent of the sponsors of the ERTA amendments to section 274(b) of the code, raising the dollar limits for deductible employee awards, was that eligible gifts should be excluded from an employee's income. Absent such an exclusion from the income of an employee-recipient, the ERTA amendments would have little, if any, practical effect.

The ERTA provision, however, did not provide for any exclusion of the value of employee awards from the recipient's gross income, and the Internal Revenue Service has taken the position that whether an employer's award to an employee constitutes taxable compensation or a gift excludable from gross income depends upon the facts and circumstances surrounding the award. The potential taxation to employees of achievement awards brings into question the viability of these award programs by making the awards far less attractive to the recipient.

The intent in adopting the ERTA amendments to section 274(b) of the code was to make employee recognition awards more available and appealing. Employee awards by their nature strengthen the relationship between a business and its employees, an objective that should not be discouraged by the tax laws. Present law discourages employers from adopting employee incentive award programs by making such programs unattractive to employee-recipients.

This bill offers a simple, straightforward, nondiscriminatory solution to the problem of the taxability to employee awards. The proposal draws on the language of section 274(b)(1)(C) of the code, and would exclude from an employee-recipient's income the value of all awards deductible to an employer under that section, with a provision for cost of living adjustments. The bill also includes reporting requirements for awards to ensure that nonexcludable amounts are included in income.

The exclusion of employee awards from the income of the recipient should not be restricted to any one type of eligible property, as was proposed by the Senate last year in the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984, but, rather, should include all items deductible to the employer. Any exclusion for employee awards must reflect the intent of the ERTA amendments to section 274(b), to promote awards that strengthen the relationship between a business and its employees. Any restriction that would limit awards to a particular type of property has no foundation in the original section 274(b) nor the ERTA amendments. The fact that there is no justification for restricting an employer's ability to make a meaningful noncash award to its employees or for favoring one type of property over another, was recognized by the Committee of Conference on the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 when it eliminated the restrictive Senate proposal.

Indeed, the absence of adequate choices could have the effect of not motivating employees whose personal tastes would not be satisfied by the restricted items offered. Where employees do not have any interest in the items being offered, they have no incentive to achieve the accomplishments which the employer wishes to reward.

Employee incentive awards should be promoted because such awards produce an important national benefit. There is little doubt that the recognition of employee achievement serves to strengthen the morale of the work force, fosters pride on the part of individual employees, and enhances employer-employee relationships.

The employee award industry believes that employee achievement awards are excludable gifts that have never constituted taxable income. Similarly, most taxpayers take the position that employee awards constitute gifts excludable from the employee's income. Because employee achievement awards have not previously been taxed, then, this proposal should not result in a revenue loss. Indeed, the bill may even raise revenue because it will increase compliance with respect to all award items above the $400 and $1,600 limits for the first time. The bill includes reporting requirements to help ensure that all awards above the excludable dollar limits are included in the taxable income of the employee-recipient.●

AGRICULTURE, RURAL DEVELOPMENT, AND RELATED AGENCIES APPROPRIATIONS BILL, 1986

HON. THOMAS A. DASCHLE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, I commend my colleagues on the Appropriations Committee, specifically Chairman JAMIE WHITTEN, and Ranking Member VIRGINIA SMITH, for their leadership in passing H.R. 3037.

In the truly bipartisan spirit which has always characterized this committee, it has absolutely rejected the administration's drastic attempt to annihilate the Department of Agriculture and program critical to American agriculture. It has said "no" to the gutting of the Farmers Home Administration, it has told the administration to keep its hands off the Rural Electric Administration, critical to those living in rural areas. It has rejected out of hand the administration's proposal to eliminate almost entirely the Soil Conservation Programs available to our farmers.

Despite sugar-coated claims, the crisis in agriculture has not disappeared. Farm debt has continued to escalate. Prices are at the lowest point since the Depression. In fact, since 1936, the farmer's share of the consumer food dollar has decreased nearly 50 percent from 51 to 27 percent, while the share taken by those between the farmer and the consumer has nearly doubled, from 49 to 73 percent.

I commend the members of the committees for their awareness of the problems, of the enormity of these problems, and of the urgent need to respond quickly to them. This congressional recognition of the agriculture crisis is in marked contrast to the indifference of the administration in failing to acknowledge its existence.

The agriculture budget originally submitted by the administration to Congress completely ignored the needs of the farmer by proposing to abolish several critical programs such as conservation, rural housing, most direct farm lending by the Farmers Home Administration, and to reduce access to feeding programs for the elderly and needy women and children.

Although the President called for termination of the Soil Conservation Service, the Congress has recommended an appropriation of $365,629,000, an increase of $11 million more than the administration recommended for conservation operations. It has also included a minimum SCS staff number of 14,177 who will help develop conservation plans including grassed waterways, animal waste management systems, and erosion control structures.

Likewise, the administration proposed severe curtailment of loan funds for the Farmers Home Administration which provides loan funds to those farmers who are unable to obtain credit from other sources. This cut could not have come at a worse time for farmers who, while seeing their income drop steadily, suffer the impact of uncontrollable rising costs of industry and labor. Although the administration recommended a phaseout of the Direct Loan Program, the committee felt that this funding is absolutely critical and wisely rejected such a proposal.

The record of the REA Program is admirable and provides a model for the efficient and effective operation of a cooperative program between the people and their Government. Unfortunately and mistakenly, this administration has not strayed from its efforts to decimate, if not eliminate, the REA Program which is essential to the continued provision of electric and telephone services in rural areas. Ignoring its benefits and value, the current Administrators of REA apparently seek only the destruction and elimination of this valuable and needed program.

Commendably, as reported by committee, this measure prohibits USDA from continuing its present mistaken policy of dismantling the Engineering Standards Department of REA. Not only would consumer costs increase if engineering standards were eliminated, the dependability and economy of rural systems would be jeopardized.

The Engineering Standards Division has worked well in establishing and maintaining dependable and efficient rural electric and telephone systems. This administration would do well to heed the advice "if it ain't broke, don't fix it" and to cease its efforts to eliminate REA engineering standards activities.

Additionally, the committee has directed REA to abandon the policy of disqualifying rural telephone and electric systems for loans through the improper application of the general funds criteria. Neither the committee nor the Congress will accept this contrived policy and transparent effort to administratively repeal existing law. This effort to deny loans and loan guarantees to qualified rural electric and telephone systems is unfortunately not an isolated incident, but another in a long series of unprecedented attempts by USDA to destroy the REA program.

Finally, the Appropriations Committee has made a number of favorable recommendations in the area of the Food and Nutrition Service administered by the Agriculture Department. These include food stamps, school lunch, Commodity Supplemental Food Program, the Feeding Program for Women, Infants, and Children, and food donations. The committee rightly determined in each of these Domestic Food Programs to fund at or above the administration's recommended level and at a total funding level of $180 million more than the President's request. Again, I reaffirm my approval of the actions taken in this legislation.●

CONGRESSIONAL CALL TO CONSCIENCE—1985

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the 1985 Congressional Call to Conscience on behalf of Soviet Jewry. I would like to commend my colleague, SANDER LEVIN, for chairing this effort this year and for his help in focusing congressional attention to the devastatingly small numbers of Soviet Jews who are permitted to emigrate from the Soviet Union.

Mr. Speaker, in only a few days, we will commemorate the 10th anniversary of the signing of the Helsinki accords on August 1, 1975. The Helsinki Final Act, which was signed by 35 nations including the United States and the Soviet Union, committed the signatories to respecting fundamental freedoms and human rights. By signing the Helsinki accords, the Soviet Union pledged to respect the fundamental freedoms of thought, conscience, religion, and belief and to permit individuals the right to leave any country, including their own.

Yet, during these 10 years since the signing, Soviet Government sponsored harassment, persecution, and arrests of Soviet Jews has increased while emigration levels have dramatically decreased. As we commemorate this anniversary, it is vital that we continue to stress to the Soviet leadership that the human rights violations perpetrated by the Soviet Union are not only in violation to the Helsinki accords which they have signed, but also contrary to the fundamental laws of humanity and compassion.

Several months ago, I adopted Yosef Kalman and his wife Lilia Sinayskaya, two refuseniks who have sought since 1981 to leave the Soviet Union and join their son in Israel. Yosef and Lilia are elderly pensioners in their seventies that gave up their health working for the Soviet Union for 50 years. Yosef suffers from thrombophlebitis of both legs, a neurological disease and a heart condition. Lilia has both an ulcer and liver disease. In 1980, she had to have a gallbladder operation.

The Kalmans clearly need to be close to their family for care and support. Their emigration would not endanger any state secrets. However, Soviet authorities have refused them this fundamental right on the flimsy pretext that they would be leaving behind other relatives in Kazan and Leningrad, and that these relatives may also want to emigrate in the future. According to their son Yuri, who lives in Israel, they need his everyday support and assistance; they need the love and care of their grandchildren. They also badly need a special diet, which is impossible to obtain in Kursk. Everyday of their living, bad damage is caused to their health; the long separation and the endless anguish undermine the forces of their soul and endanger their lives.

And yet, the Soviet Government has remained stone-hearted in deciding their fate. The Kalmans have been repeatedly refused the right to emigrate and join their family. The plight of the Kalmans is very real indeed and I commend their courage and perserverance. However, they are just one couple out of the many thousands that are experiencing the same treatment, the same harassment, the same heartlessness.

We must continue to protest the treatment of the 2 million Soviet Jews at every step. We will not have accomplished our purpose and fulfilled our moral responsibilities until the day comes when Soviet Jews will be free to profess and practice their religion, preserve their cultural heritage and exercise their right to emigrate and live where they choose. Until that day, we must and will continue to persevere.●

REMOVING ASBESTOS HAZARDS IN OUR SCHOOLS

HON. DOUG WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, many school buildings across the country, including some in the Pittsburgh area, were constructed at a time when asbestos was used for its insulating and fire retardant qualities. However, since that time, many questions about asbestos have been raised and it has been found in some cases to be a human carcinogen. In many classrooms, teachers and students alike could be inhaling asbestos fibers, only to discover many years down the road that they have lung disease. All levels of government must respond to this dangerous situation.

In my own district in western Pennsylvania, efforts are underway to eliminate asbestos hazards. I would specifically point to the work of the Allegheny County Health Department which formed a task force to create an Asbestos Public Information Program. One of the task force's recommendations, which has been adopted by the health department, was to send asbestos school survey forms to all the schools in the county. Of the schools that returned the survey—228 of 500—and had been inspected for friable asbestos—86 percent, 60 percent reported that it is present.

I am pleased that the House on July 25 approved $50 million in funding for the Asbestos Abatement Program with my support. Earlier this year I urged the Appropriations Committee to include funding for the program. I will work for final enactment with the hope that this will help schools get started on what some have called a $1.4 billion problem. The Federal Government cannot do it all, but some seed money ought to help. Additionally, we must make sure the kinks are eliminated from the administration of the program and I am pleased that congressional hearings this year have highlighted these problems. There have been problems in schools determining what is and what is not a health risk. There have been problems with unqualified removal contractors. The bill we passed last week—H.R. 3038, provided EPA appropriations—requires that all projects funded by EPA be conducted by certified and trained contractors. And we have directed EPA to develop a hazard ranking system, to give schools guidance in this area.

Federal guidance on school asbestos removal has proceeded in fits and starts in recent years. In 1980, Congress enacted the Asbestos School Hazard Detection and Control Act, but the administration did not request funding for it. Regulations were not published until 1982. In 1984, we transferred the program to be solely administered by EPA and provided $50 million. I do hope that with this recent action we can put the program on a strong footing. We must insure a safe environment for our schoolchildren.●

DR. CAROLYNE K. DAVIS

HON. BILL SCHUETTE

OF MICHIGAN

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. SCHUETTE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to note the accomplishments of the distinguished Dr. Carolyne K. Davis. I thank the gentleman from Michigan, Congressman PURSELL for sponsoring this special order so that like-minded Members could offer their praise of Dr. Davis.

This occasion is particularly satisfying because Dr. Davis was chairman of the nursing department at the University of Michigan, where she later became vice president in charge of academic affairs, and I know that her tenure there was an unqualified success.

Dr. Davis' accomplishments as Director of the Health Care Financing Administration are their own tribute to her skills as an administrator. Dr. Davis knows the health care profession as well as she understands the budgetary nuts and bolts of financing Medicare and Medicaid.

When Dr. Davis assumed control of HCFA, it was heading for bankruptcy by 1986. Through sheer administrative skill and political fortitude, Dr. Davis has implemented the prospective payment program which brought spiralling Medicare cost under control while providing the same quality of health care. This sweeping change, among others, has been part of a comprehensive restructuring of the Medicare and Medicaid system. This restructuring has ensured that these health care systems will survive into the 1990's, and allow Congress the time to address the long-term health care needs of this Nation.

Mr. Speaker, Dr. Davis has been a tremendous help to me in my short time in Washington, and I for one, will be sorry to see her go.

She has presided over the operations of the HCFA through the Reagan administration, and should get much of the credit for the improvements that have been made in administering the health care of the 50 million citizens HCFA serves. I wanted to take a moment to express my thanks to her, my pride in her service to the people of Michigan and the United States, and to wish her the best of luck in her new endeavors.●

SALUTE TO THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF SOCIAL SECURITY

HON. BERNARD J. DWYER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. DWYER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, this year our Nation commemorates the 50th anniversary of our most landmark economic security legislation, the Social Security Act, enacted by the Congress and signed into law by President Franklin Roosevelt on August 14, 1935.

During the month of August, local Social Security offices in cities and towns throughout the Nation will be celebrating the 50th anniversary of this landmark law, and we all owe a huge debt of gratitude to those able and dedicated individuals who have staffed these offices and transformed the fine principles of the Social Security Act into practice.

Without the efforts of these professionals, Social Security would not be the tremendous success story that it is today. The fine record of service established by the local Social Security offices in New Jersey's Sixth District illustrate their importance.

As Members of Congress, we have occasion to deal frequently with the local Social Security offices, and I have been continually impressed with the efficiency and responsiveness of the staff in my district who exemplify this tradition of excellence we have come to associate with Social Security during the five decades since its enactment.

The 50th anniversary of the Social Security Act is also an appropriate time to reaffirm the fundamental principles of this law which has provided a measure of protection to the aged, disabled and needy of our society. Social Security has allowed people to contribute to their future, and not live in fear of losing their security and independence in their retirement years. The monthly cash benefits received by nearly 37 million Americans provide a base of economic protection on which beneficiaries can build additional protection through pensions, insurance, savings and other income. With the formation of Medicare in 1965, Social Security was expanded to provide much-needed medical assistance to senior citizens.

With the bipartisan agreement on the Social Security Amendments of 1983, we can reassure Americans that the system is securely financed and one on which we all can depend.

Mr. Speaker, I know that my colleagues join me in thanking the excellent workers who have staffed the Social Security district offices for the past 50 years, and in reaffirming our steadfast support for this program in its 50th year.

All Americans should be proud of the brilliant success of the Social Security system in its first half century. It grew from the suffering of the Depression, and now provides the basic measure of safety and financial solvency for all Americans.●

THE 10TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE SIGNING OF THE HELSINKI FINAL ACT

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, on August 1, 1975, the heads of 35 European and North American nations signed the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. The Helsinki Final Act obligated the participants to work for greater cooperation in the military, economic, scientific, cultural, educational, and humanitarian spheres. The final act also includes broad humanitarian provisions commonly referred to as Basket III, which contains provisions for the reunification of families, the rights of citizens to enter and leave countries regularly on family visits, marriage across national lines, and the improvements in working conditions for journalist abroad.

On this day, August 1, 1985, the 10th anniversary of the signing of the Helsinki accord, very little can be seen in terms of concrete adherence to the Final Act by the Soviet Union.

The number of Soviet Jews permitted to emigrate has dwindled to almost nothing. The Soviet Union is violating the Helsinki agreement by denying political dissidents, refuseniks, and prisoners of conscience the basic human right of freedom of communication.

Soviet noncompliance reflects its weak commitment to the Helsinki agreement. A reassessment of this policy is long overdue. It is time to set a new course on Helsinki. I call on General Secretary Gorbachev to honor the Soviet commitment to the provisions of the Helsinki accords by making significant and visible changes in its emigration policies and treatment of Soviet Jews.●

THE 10TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE HELSINKI FINAL ACT

HON. FRANK HORTON

OF NEW YORK

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, August 1 will mark the 10th anniversary of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, better known as the Helsinki accords. I would like to commend my colleagues on the Helsinki Commission for their diligence in bringing this anniversary to the public's attention.

Remembrances such as this serve many purposes. This anniversary is a reminder of the many commitments made by those 35 signatory nations. It reaffirms our stated objectives and obligations in the final act. Finally, it allows us to look back and examine the successes and failures of the first 10 years of the Helsinki accords.

We have seen many steps taken which promote East-West cooperation in the sciences, environment, and transportation. The final act encouraged the growth of trade, led to freer travel policies in Eastern Europe, and fostered better United States-Soviet communication before major military maneuvers.

In addition, the Helsinki accords provided a mutually agreed upon forum by which to examine the human rights records of each of the signatories, and provide greater discussion of internal policies which directly relate to human rights abuses.

However, it has become increasingly clear that a number of cosignatories have rejected the most basic tenets of the Helsinki Final Act. The Soviet Union and its Eastern European satellites have become more and more repressive in their fight against human rights activists. The number of activists arrested inside the Soviet Union has tripled in recent years. Religious persecution, forced labor, and psychiatric abuses have become commonplace throughout all of Eastern Europe. In addition, the invasion of Afghanistan and the imposition of martial law in Poland continue to serve as brutal reminders of the neglect the Helsinki Final Act has received in much of the Soviet bloc.

Mr. Speaker, the pledge by all 35 signatories to guarantee certain human rights and to improve the flow of information across borders must not be forgotten. As we approach the summit meetings between the United States and the Soviet Union, let this 10th anniversary serve as a reminder that some gains have been made. Many more must come.●

REPRESENTATIVE MONTGOMERY TO RECEIVE NCOA'S HIGHEST AWARD

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, as a past recipient of the Non Commissioned Officers Association of the USA [NCOA] L. Mendel Rivers Award for Legislative Action, I am proud and privileged to announce that our colleague, the Honorable G.V. SONNY MONTGOMERY, has been selected to receive that prestigious honor for the year 1984–85.

The award, so aptly named as a tribute to the late L. Mendel Rivers, past chairman of the House Armed Services Committee and a giant of a friend to all men and women in our uniformed services, will be presented to SONNY, September 11, 1985, by the president of NCOA, retired Army command Sgt. Maj. Walter W. Krueger.

SONNY was selected by the NCOA International Board of Directors for his dedicated and devoted service as a member of this body and as one who in the past year has proven to the association to be a special friend of our service members, both past and present. He is a true patriot with a great love for this country and for those who serve and have served in the Armed Forces of the United States.

He has been and continues to be a standard bearer on the House Armed Services Committee for all military personnel on active duty and in the National Guard and Reserve. He is, as equally important, the No. 1 congressional spokesman for our veterans. His record as chairman, House Veterans' Affairs Committee, stands as a monument for those who serve or have served our Nation in war and peace.

Additionally, SONNY was selected for his tenacity in having a new peacetime GI bill enacted in law. NCOA was the first military or veterans organization to seek a new education package for post-Vietnam era veterans and realized the attainment of its 10-year goal when SONNY successfully moved his bill through Congress last year.

The NCOA L. Mendel Rivers Award was first introduced in Congress in 1972 by one of our colleagues, the late F. Edward Hebert of Louisiana, who alike to Mendel Rivers was a former chairman of the House Armed Services Committee.

Eddie was the first Member of the House to receive the award. Since then it has been presented to Representatives Tom Downing, Bob Wilson, and Mendel Davis, now retired; and to current Members, CHARLIE BENNETT, BILL NICHOLS, and yours truly. On the Senate side, STROM THURMOND, John Tower (now retired), BOB DOLE, BILL ARMSTRONG, BILL COHEN, and SAM NUNN are past recipients.

SONNY will join this distinguished group, September 11, at the NCOA 13th annual congressional reception. all Members of Congress will receive an invitation to the affair so I encourage you to stop by the Cannon Caucus Room that evening to congratulate him.

Meanwhile, I extend to our colleague, SONNY, my personal congratulations and salute the noncommissioned and petty officers; active duty, reservists, guardsmen, and veterans; whose membership creates the largest enlisted military association in the Nation, the Non Commissioned Officers Association of the USA [NCOA]. They are to be commended for choosing my friend, SONNY, as this year's recipient.●

FEAST-OR-FAMINE AND DEFENSE WASTE

HON. JOHN R. McKERNAN, JR.

OF MAINE

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. McKERNAN. Mr. Speaker, every Member of Congress is acutely aware of the Nation's burgeoning budget deficit. Gaining control over Federal spending is at the top of the congressional agenda but, based on the events of the past few weeks alone, I think we would all agree that there are no easy solutions to this problem.

Because of its size and the steady increases in its budget in recent years, the Department of Defense is frequently seen as a target for large-scale reductions. However, discussions about how to reduce defense spending have sometimes been characterized more by heat than by light.

In a recent article published by the Los Angeles Times, my colleague, Congressman JOHN MCCAIN of Arizona, provides a well-reasoned treatment of what can be done to reduce defense spending without endangering our national security. Congressman MCCAIN's views on this subject are particularly credible, given his personal commitment to a strong national defense. I would like to share with my colleagues the views advanced by Congressman MCCAIN in the Times article of June 23, 1985.

[From the Los Angeles Times, June 23, 1985]

FEAST OR FAMINE AND DEFENSE WASTE

(By John McCain)

Some years ago, as the Navy liaison officer to the Senate, I lobbied for the defense budget. Then, the job was relatively easy; Congress voiced little opposition to what most members realized was a desperately needed buildup. Today, my role in the defense budget process is different, and the task is not so simply. American are not as willing as they were in 1980 to devote staggering amounts of dollars to an agency that appears riddled with waste, mismanagement and greed.

Recenlty a group of senior Pentagon officials told the Republican Congressional Conference that not one dol..r less could be spent on America's defense without harming national security. Billions, however, can be cut from the Pentagon's budget without endangering America's security or that of our allies.

Many in Congress agree that the solution to the dilemma of the deficit is an overall budget freeze that applies equally to all spending categories. The Pentagon, unlike other government agencies that have been streamlined over the past few years, is grossly inefficient and could play a significant role in reducing the debt. It has created obvious targets for those committed to reduce spending—the $600 ashtray, the $7,000 coffee pot, and other such horror stories. We must solve problems in the procurement process, but ending all the waste there will save only a few billion dollars—scarcely a dent in the deficit.

If we are truly dedicated to reducing the defense budget in a sensible fashion, we must look beyond spare-parts scandals. For example, the DIVAD anti-aircraft weapons has yet to prove its effectiveness in shooting down planes; it certainly does not merit a price tag of $6.8 million apiece. Cutting the entire program could save $4 billion. Similarly, additional savings could be realized by forgoing the purchase of almost 7,000 Bradley armored fighting vehicles requested by the Army. Existing personnel carriers could be modified and supplemented by procuring just 2,000 Bradleys, saving more than $4 billion.

These are just two examples of inefficient weapons systems that could be cut without endangering our national security. But members of Congress (and their constituents) will also have to take their licks if we are truly serious about defense cuts. Congress can no longer squander money on sacred cows of the defense budget.

Yet we must also recognize that facile criticisms serve no purpose in ending inefficiency. A recently published comparison of the costs of today's F-15 fighter with World War II's P-47 makes interesting reading, but such comparisons are superficial and serve only to divert attention from the real issues. The plane that I flew in Vietnam was less complex and expensive than its successor, but the increasing sophistication of the opponent we may face makes yesterday's weapons obsolete.

A broader misconception holds that simply reducing the Pentagon's budget will solve all of our fiscal problems. The 1986 defense budget will be approximately $270 billion; our deficit is close to $200 billion. Obviously, even cutting the defense budget by two-thirds would still not make the deficit disappear.

What are the solutions? We must recognize that our defense needs are a function of our foreign policy. So we must agree on overall foreign-policy goals and commitments. We can no longer be the world's policeman, nor can we withdraw to Fortress America. Between these two extremes, we need the bipartisan consensus that has been sadly absent since the Vietnam War. This does not mean falling into line behind successive Presidents. It means reaching broad agreement on our vital interests and the level of commitment needed to maintain them.

Few would deny that strategic realities require an American presence in Europe, but more than 60% of the defense budget is committed to the defense of our allies. Given the parsimonious attitude of our NATO and Asian allies, how large an American presence abroad is warranted? What are America's interests in the Persian Gulf, as opposed to those of our allies? And what level of American forces is required to defend our interests there?

Once the outlines of a broadly supported, long-term foreign policy are established, we can begin to match force (and spending) levels to those commitments. Such levels must then be funded with consistency. The feast-or-famine character of defense spending since the early 1960s is partly responsible for today's inflated budget; the sad state of America's defenses five years ago provoked what some would characterize as the Pentagon's greed.

A general who is offered more tanks than he can now use will probably accept, knowing that down the road he will face a drastically reduced budget. A Pentagon confident of consistent, adequate spending will not plead for excessive budgets as a buffer against future shortages; consistent levels would also ameliorate the Pentagon's willingness to accept inferior weapons.

We stand on the threshold of a long-needed redefinition of our defense needs. Presidents come and go, but our pledge to Europe has endured because the commitment was the result of bipartisan accord. The determination of our long-term national security needs must rest with Congress as well as the executive branch. Only by forging a bipartisan consensus can we truly resolve the current debate and provide the best possible defense at the least possible cost to the taxpayer.●

TRIBUTE TO DR. W.F. GIBSON

HON. CARROLL A. CAMPBELL, JR.

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to pay special tribute to Dr. W.F. Gibson of Greenville, SC, who has recently been named chairman of the National Board of Directors of the NAACP.

This honor came as no surprise to those of us who know Bill Gibson, for his entire career has been marked by success and a tireless pursuit of human and civil rights. His tremendous leadership ability has been recognized through the many offices he has held including local, State and national NAACP positions, chair of the Greenville, SC, Human Relations Commission, chair of the S.C. Advisory Committee to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, member of the Alston-Wilkes Society, member of the S.C. Governor's Task Force on Critical Human Needs and member of the S.C. Human Affairs Commission.

In addition, Bill has received well-deserved awards and honors too numerous to mention from such organizations as civic clubs, educational institutions civil rights groups, religious organizations, fraternities, municipalities, and community groups.

Dr. Gibson was educated at Allen University, North Carolina A&T State University, and Meharry Medical College-School of Dentistry. He took his internship at Harlem Hospital in New York City, and now serves the Greenville area in the private practice of general dentistry.

As a Member of Congress, I have had occasions to call on Bill Gibson's expertise many times, and I have always valued his input. He is a man of strongly held and vigorously defended beliefs, and he is highly respected for his concern, compassion and commitment.

We are proud of Bill Gibson in South Carolina, and that pride will be voiced on Friday, August 2, when some of this Nation's finest citizens will gather in Greenville to pay tribute to this man who has contributed so much to so many. Although a previously scheduled trade mission will not allow me to be with Bill and his friends, my thoughts will certainly be there.●

U.S. COAST GUARD

HON. ROBERT H. MICHEL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, we are celebrating the 195th anniversary of the U.S. Coast Guard. It is one of our most important services, yet its duties and accomplishments are relatively unknown. I believe our colleagues should know more about this vital part of our national security system.

First of all, it is our Nation's oldest, continuous sea going armed force.

In 1789, several enactments of the First Congress, providing authority for regulation of foreign commerce, recognized the need for a maritime police service as part of the national fiscal organization. The next year, Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, requested a fleet of 10 cutters, with the "first cost of one of these boats, completely equipped * * * computed at $1,000."

The Coast Guard was engaged in active service during the War of 1812, the Seminole War of 1836, the Mexican War, the Civil War and the Spanish-American War. During the First World War, by order of the President, the Coast Guard was transferred to the Navy. During the Korean war, the Coast Guard served independent of Navy control and played an important role in protecting harbor facilities and in helping to establish the Korean Coast Guard.

In 1965, a fleet of 17 82-foot patrol vessels was placed under U.S. Navy operational control for coastal and river surveillance in Vietnam. Coast Guard Squadron 1's mission expanded to include ports and waterways security, merchant marine details, navigational aid, and additional surveillance and interdiction duties.

Today the Coast Guard continues its traditional roles as the key Federal customs agency for maritime law enforcement, and as a component of the armed services. We each have read in recent months of Coast Guard seizures of thousands of pounds of marijuana, and increasing quantities of cocaine.

This "wartime" effort against well-financed adversaries has been waged, often under life-endangering circumstances, without loss of life.

Against more traditional aggressors, this armed service has enhanced the peacetime defense by assigning additional military duties to Coast Guard Atlantic and Pacific commanders in the newly established Maritime Defense Zones.

Today, this multimission service operates under the Department of Transportation—since 1967. My congratulations and best wishes go to Secretary Elizabeth Dole and to all those who proudly serve under the proud name of U.S. Coast Guard.●

TRIBUTE TO DR. HERBERT SCOVILLE, JR., ARMS CONTROL ADVOCATE

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I want to pay tribute to Dr. Herbert Scoville, Jr., who died yesterday. Dr. Scoville had a long and distinguished career as an arms control advocate and as an authority on advanced military technologies.

Dr. Scoville was an active participant in the public debate on arms control, new nuclear weaponry, and relations with the Soviet Union. I respected him as a knowledgeable and experienced expert on arms control issues who could always be counted on to offer positive suggestions and recommendations for achieving progress in arms control.

In February of this year I invited Dr. Scoville to give a presentation as an arms control expert at the Foreign Affairs Committee's first arms control workshop. This workshop was the first in a series of arms control workshops sponsored by the Foreign Affairs Committee in conjunction with the Congressional Research Service. These workshops are part of an effort that I am making to involve my colleagues in a comprehensive review and study of our country's nuclear arms control policy and its role in our national security. Dr. Scoville was an excellent choice to begin this series. His perceptive comments and articulate conclusions about the history of nuclear arms control negotiations and the importance of arms control to U.S. national security were consistent with so many other fine appearances he had made with Congress. His educational efforts with the public and with Members of Congress have been appreciated. They are a lasting contribution to public awareness about the dangers of nuclear war and the importance of arms control.

Dr. Scoville had an extensive career in Government service and then in the arms control community. His Government service included work as a senior scientist from 1946 to 1948 at Los Alamos for the Atomic Energy Commission, as Technical Director from 1948 to 1955 of the Defense Department's Armed Forces Special Weapons Project, as Deputy Director of Science and Technology from 1955 to 1963 for the Central Intelligence Agency, and then, until 1969, as Assistant Director for Science and Technology at the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency. In 1969 Dr. Scoville left Government service and was selected as the Director of the Arms Control Program at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Starting in the 1960's he served on a number of advisory panels and he was a member of several delegations to arms control conferences. Beginning in 1979 he served as president of the Arms Control Association. His most recent books include "Missile Madness" and "MX."

Dr. Scoville's long-term commitment to the process of arms control as a way of reducing the dangers of nuclear war was recognized in 1981 when he received the Rockefeller Public Service Award and was cited for "mobilizing his energies, his scientific knowledge, and his political insight in an effort to create a public awareness of the importance of arms control to American and international security." I simply want to add my own feelings of respect for Dr. Scoville's commitment to arms control, his dedication to public education, and his sense of urgency.●

THE 115TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BEAUTIFUL ZION A.M.E. CHURCH

HON. RICHARD C. SHELBY

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. SHELBY. Mr. Speaker, Sunday, July 28, marked the 115th anniversary of the beautiful Zion African Methodist Episcopal Church in Tuscaloosa, AL. The church organized in 1870, is listed with the State of Alabama as a historical site created and developed by freed slaves in the Tuscaloosa community shortly after the Civil War.

This anniversary is a significant event in the life of the beautiful Zion A.M.E. Church, and its recognition and celebration are important. The occasion provides the church an opportunity to reflect on its history, to assess its past performance, and to reestablish pride in the past achievements.

This anniversary is a happy occasion because it does not mark the ending of an era, but the continuation of a dream, a task, begun 115 years ago. As the beautiful Zion A.M.E. Church approaches the future, it does so with renewed commitment and dedication. I am certain that this congregation will not only repeat the success of the past, but go on to higher levels of achievement. Please join me in congratulating Rev. John D. Windsor and the members of the beautiful Zion A.M.E. Church on this joyous occasion.●

HONORING MICHAEL S. PALLAK, PH.D.

HON. DOUG WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to commend Dr. Michael S. Pallak, who will end his term as executive officer of the American Psychological Association next month.

Dr. Pallak has guided his association during a phase of growth unprecedented in its 90 years of existence. He has overseen the publication of 20 scientific journals and has added the magazine Phychology Today to the association's portfolio. He has led a new effort to focus psychology's knowledge on national policy concerns and has assisted in congressional deliberations by testifying frequently before our committees. His guidance has been particularly helpful in the work of the subcommittee which I chair, the House Science, Research and Technology Subcommittee. Dr. Pallak has marshaled APA's financial resources to make certain that the psychologists of the future will have a vital national association behind them.

In his final report to the APA membership, published in June, he wrote:

The decade ahead should see an amazing array of accomplishments on behalf of psychology and an impressive array of contributions to the national discussions. Anything less would violate the trust that our members and the public have placed in us.

Dr. Michael Pallak has earned the trust that all leaders must have. In the past 10 years, he has exemplified the professional qualities that make this Nation great. In the future, I trust that he will continue his superb work, and I look forward on behalf of my colleagues to the fruits of his labor.●

Mr. Lindley will be honored in August by the National Association of Truck Stop Operators for his service as chairman of the board of the association, and I would like to take this time to bring his accomplishments to the attention of my colleagues in the House of Representatives.

In addition to serving as chairman of the National Association of Truck Stop Operators, Mr. Lindley has also been vice chairman of the 900-member national organization. He has been active in his community for many years and has held numerous leading positions in community groups.

Mr. Lindley has served as president of the Eaton, OH, Rotary Club; director of the Eaton Area Chamber of Commerce; and president, vice president, and 8-year member of the Eaton Board of Education. Gene has also served as president of the Eaton PTA, as an elder in the Eaton Presbyterian Church; and as president of the Presbyterian Church Corp. I have known Gene for many years and have appreciated his service on my congressional advisory council. Gene and his wife Alice have four fine children: Doug, Susan, Brenda, and Matt.

I am sure that Gene's work with the National Association of Truck Stop Operators will continue long after his tenure as chairman is complete, just as I am sure that he will continue to add to his fine record of generous service and active participation in his community. I would ask my colleagues to join me in saluting Gene Lindley and in wishing him future success and fulfillment in his work.●

POLKA JOE WOJKIEWICZ

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, August 3 is "Polka Joe Wojkiewicz Day" in Wisconsin.

This proclamation coincides with the "International Polka Festival," which will be held this weekend, August 2-4, in Rosemont, IL. This musical celebration promises to be a fun-filled event. Bands from across the Nation will be featured, playing their best and most light-hearted melodies. I am sure festival attendees will be dancing from noon to night.

The spotlight will also be on the great polka musicians who have devoted many years to promoting the music. Mr. Joe Wojkiewicz, Sr., of Green Bay, WI, will be among those musicians.

Mr. Wojkiewicz, whom friends know as "Polka Joe," received this year the highest number of ballots in the selection of members to the Polka Music Hall of Fame. This honor is a culmination of a lifelong love for polka music and sharing its joys with other people.

A Wisconsin native, Mr. Wojkiewicz began performing at an early stage, for his father had his own band. As he grew to adulthood, his interest in promoting polka music grew, leading him to many ballrooms and dance halls, even during his World War II stint in the Army.

In the late 1940's, he and his wife, Beatrice, moved to Green Bay and began to raise a family. He continued to promote and perform actively in polka music festivals and concerts. He even was involved in the recording under his own private label the music of several polka bands.

Fortunately, his accomplishments have not gone unnoticed. He was named "Polka Man of the Year" by the Wisconsin Orchestra Leaders Association for the years 1971 and 1972. His fame spread throughout the Nation, wherever people enjoy listening and dancing to good polka music.

The citizens of Wisconsin's Eighth District enjoy good polka music and good times. They are well acquainted with the hard work and musical achievements of Mr. Wojkiewicz. He has devoted over 45 years to sharing polka music with his family and fellow Americans. His dedication to and love for the happy sound of polka music has led to enduring friendships and great personal satisfaction. "Polka Joe" Wojkiewicz has earned the respect and admiration of polka music followers everywhere.●

CAMBRIA COUNTY COMMUNITY ACTION 20TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. JOHN P. MURTHA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, September 6, a banquet will honor the 20th anniversary of the Cambria County Community Action Counsel.

Those 20 years of activity have spanned a era of unprecedented challenge and change in the Cambria County area. We have had to overcome a stunning natural disaster while also offsetting the impact of an economic revolution that has changed the face of our economy and altered the lives of thousands of families.

Poverty, family problems, the difficulties caused by recession have not been strangers to our area over those years. A key in helping thousands of families to cope with the situation and hold their lives and families together has been the community action agency.

Through their work in programs like WIC, Head Start, Weatherization, homemaker services, emergency shelter, transportation, and information sharing, the agency and its workers have been essential to the community.

It is a pleasure for me to join in recognizing the outstanding contribution to our community made by the Cambria County Community Action Council, and to wish them continued success in facing the challenges ahead for our community.●

HELPING STATE VETERANS HOMES

HON. JOHN R. McKERNAN, JR.

OF MAINE

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. McKERNAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am intoducing legislation designed to correct a problem facing Medicaid-certified State veterans' homes. Passage of this legislation will help these nursing homes, such as the Maine Veterans Home, to make full and proper use of the funds Congress has authorized for the benefit of veterans.

The problem these veterans' homes are facing stems from the treatment of the per diem payments made to the homes by the Veterans' Administration under section 641 of title 38, United States Code. The General Counsel of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services has ruled, in an opinion requested by the Maine congressional delegation, that the per diem payments paid to veterans' homes must be treated as third-party liability payments, and, therefore, must be offset against Medicaid payments due to the homes. In other words, the VA per diem payments are of no benefit to those homes with Medicaid patients, since Medicaid payments are reduced by an amount equal to the VA stipend.

I do not believe that it is the intention of Congress, in authorizing the VA per diem payments, to have those funds simply replace Medicaid money. The VA payments are for the improvement in the quality of care for veterans. As long as the current legal requirement that the payments be treated as a third-party liability remains, there will be no choice as to the treatment of the payments by the States and the homes—the payments will simply offset Medicaid funds.

The legislation I am introducing today will resolve this situation by stating that the VA per diem payments shall not be treated as third party liability payments for Medicaid purposes. Under this legislation, States would not be required to reduce Medicaid payments to veterans' homes by the amount of the VA stipend. These homes would then be able to use these funds for the full benefit of their veterans.

As our Nation's veterans population grows older, we must take adequate steps to provide for their care. According to the VA report, "Caring for the Older Veteran," the VA will need to provide extended care capacity for at least 63,000 veterans in 1990 and 97,000 in 2000. This compares to an estimated average of 40,000 veterans in fiscal year 1985.

The system of State veterans' homes is an essential element in the provision of long-term care, and a key part of Federal support for these nursing homes is the VA per diem payment. By Congress passing legislation I am introducing, we can demonstrate that we will continue to give our full support to these homes.

I urge my colleagues to support this important legislation on behalf of our Nation's elderly veterans.●

WHY BOYCOTT JUST GRAPES?

HON. RICHARD H. LEHMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. LEHMAN of California. Mr. Speaker, today the United Farm Workers of America announced the expansion of their ill-conceived and counterproductive boycott of California table grapes.

What Congressmen, concerned citizens, and consumers should know is that the union, by it's own admission, has no legitimate complaint against the farmers it now seeks to destroy.

The union acknowledges that their complaint is against the Governor of California, George Deukmejian, and his appointees to the State Agricultural Labor Relations Board. They say he has stacked the board against them.

This haggling is nothing new. For 6 years the growers made the same allegation against Governor Brown, who stacked the board in favor of the UFW.

If the UFW wants to oppose Governor Deukmejian and his policies then they should do so in an upfront, straightforward manner. Boycotting thousands of family farmers will not change the Governors mind. It will only make farmers less willing to sign contracts with an organization more interested in destroying them, than in bettering their union's position.

One final point to demonstrate the flawed logic of this selective boycott. Why boycott just grapes? We grow hundreds of handpicked crops in California, but the UFW has chosen to punish only one group of farmers for the Governor's actions.●

CEASE FIRE

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, on July 16, LANE EVANS, chairman of the Vietnam Era Veterans in Congress Caucus and I hosted a premier screening of "Cease Fire" for members of the caucus, the House and Senate Veterans' Affairs Committees and their staffs.

"Cease Fire" is a motion picture that realistically depicts the agonizing and destructive effects that combat and war can have on those who defend our freedoms.

Set 15 years following the return of a Vietnam veteran, "Cease Fire" focuses on the problems, remembrances, and tragedies of one man trying to survive his combat experiences.

It's a powerfully moving film and we recommend that everyone take the opportunity to see this movie when it is released later this fall. It is not a film about the rightness or the wrongness of the Vietnam conflict. It is not a film about the comic strip heroics of a fictional character. But instead, it is an exploration of the difficulties so many of our veterans face following their return home from war. It's a film that should be seen by veterans—to help them cope. It's a film that should be seen by everyone—to help them understand.

"Cease Fire" was written and coproduced by George Fernandez, a Vietnam veteran, and is based on his stage play "Vietnam Trilogy." It's haunting. It's real. And it should be seen by each of us—to help us remember the job we, as Members of Congress, have to do.●

PAN-AMERICAN GAMES

HON. WILLIAM M. THOMAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Speaker, with the approach of the 10th Quadrennial Pan-American Games in August 1987, we look forward to an event in which the 37 nations of the Western Hemisphere come together in a spirit of cooperation and competition. The games, which are to be held in Indianapolis will be hosted by the United States for the first time in 30 years. It will be an important athletic and cultural event and many people have come together to ensure the smooth and efficient operation of the games.

Legislation was recently introduced to allow the duty-free entry of the personal effects, equipment, and other related articles of participants, officials, and other accredited members of the delegations (H.R. 2723). This legislation, which is supported by the U.S. Customs Service, will greatly expedite the entry of participants through a portion of the Customs clearance process. There is another portion of the Federal inspection, however, which cannot be waived for participants of the Pan-American Games or any other individual entering the United States—agricultural inspection.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture's Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service [APHIS] inspects incoming passengers, baggage, and cargo at ports of entry to prevent the introduction of pests and diseases that could seriously damage the agricultural industry. Recent episodes with costly diseases such as citrus canker and avian influenza demonstrate the pressing need to provide adequate inspections to exclude such diseases.

Many of the participants in the Pan-American Games will want to bring familiar foods for their stay, and some of these foods could be the bearers of agricultural pests and diseases. In addition, equestrian events will require the inspection and quarantine of any horses entering the country. APHIS was fully involved in the Olympic Games in Los Angeles, and they stand prepared once again. They are ready to cooperate in every way possible with the organizing officials to provide advance information and to arrange expedited clearance procedures consistent with their mission of protecting American agriculture.●

OUTSTANDING CASEWORKER

HON. GENE CHAPPIE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. CHAPPIE. Mr. Speaker, today I want to bring to the attention of the House an individual who deserves special recognition because of her 4½ years of public service on behalf of northern Californians. Her name is Jane Winston Rogers, and today is her last day as a caseworker in my Chico office.

Her coworkers and I will miss her, not only because she has done such an outstanding job for the people of northern California, but also because we've really enjoyed working with her.

It takes a special person to be a good caseworker, and Jane is one of the best. Good caseworkers are compassionate and caring. They're also persistent, efficient, and tough when they need to be. They work long hours, often without receiving the recognition and praise they deserve.

In the 4½ years Jane has worked as a caseworker, she's handled every type of case that is referred to a congressional office. She's solved Social Security and Medicare claim problems for senior citizens. She's helped disabled veterans who weren't receiving their veterans' disability checks, and assisted those who had trouble with the Immigration and Naturalization Service and the Internal Revenue Service. She's been a sounding board for the frustrated and a source of comfort for those tangled up in the Federal Government's bureaucracy.

Over the years, her hard work hasn't gone unnoticed. Last month, the regional commissioner for the Social Security Administration made a special trip to the Chico office to present Jane with a certificate of commendation for her work on behalf of Social Security recipients. I've also received many letters of appreciation from those helped by Jane. I'd like to share the contents of one of those letters with you from a Lewiston man who wrote, "I would also like to thank your very capable coworker, Jane Rogers, who spent quite a lot of time on my case and who was very pleasant and understanding even when I thought that I was being a pest."

I know I speak for many northern Californians when I wish Jane the best of luck in her new career and thank her for her outstanding service to the State. She won't be easy to replace, and she certainly won't be forgotten.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. WILLIAM E. DANNEMEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, due to prior commitments in my congressional district, I was not present for the end of the session on July 25, in which I missed one vote, and the session on July 26, in which I missed four rollcall votes. Had I been present I would have voted:

JULY 25

"Aye" on House Joint Resolution 187, the Compact of Free Association, which was amended by a compromise substitute amendment.

JULY 26

"Aye" on the motion to approve the Journal proceedings of the previous day.

"Nay" on House Resolution 236 to waive certain points of order against consideration of H.R. 3036.

"Nay" on the Nelson substitute amendment which would moderately decrease the levels of spending for allowances and office staff for former Presidents.

"Aye" on the Jacobs amendment to reduce the appropriation for allowances and office staff for former Presidents.●

CROPS DESTROYED BY CRICKETS AND GRASSHOPPERS

HON. LARRY E. CRAIG

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, as many of you have heard over the past several months, millions of grasshoppers and crickets have ravaged the Federal rangelands of the West and have destroyed millions of dollars' worth of private croplands. Today I am introducing legislation to protect Western and Midwestern States from these crop damaging pests. My bill would provide for the expenditure or transfer of funds by the Secretary of the Interior to the Secretary of Agriculture for the emergency prevention, supression, control, or eradication of grasshoppers or crickets on public lands.

In the past, emergency measures have been taken but only to come up with too little too late for many farmers and ranchers who have been economically devastated. This bill would make available to the Secretary of the Interior funds for obligation incurred on Federal lands subject to the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior during the preceding fiscal year.

This is not a Government program but merely asks that the Government be responsible neighbors on those areas where public and private land adjoin. In 1985 alone, over 6 million acres were sprayed in my home State of Idaho. And yet, crop losses will still range in the millions due to the lack of an adequate system of pest control on public rangeland.

Colleagues of the House, join me in sponsoring this legislation to see that the Federal Government fulfills its responsibilities of a landowner and help rid the American farmer and rancher of these devastating losses.●

REFLECTIONS ON THE HELSINKI ACCORDS

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I inserted in the RECORD excerpts from a report published by the North Atlantic Assembly's Committee on Civilian Affairs on the "Implementation of the Humanitarian Commitments Entered into at the CSCE." Today I would like to share with my colleagues two articles on the Helsinki accords. One is from the July 25 edition of the Christian Science Monitor. The other is from today's Washington Post.

I believe that both articles present a balanced and informative account of the Helsinki accords: its successes, its failures. I hope that my colleagues will take time to look at these articles, particularly during this week which marks the 10th anniversary of the Final Act of the Conference on Security in Europe—more commonly known as the Helsinki accords.

The articles follow:

[From the Washington Post, July 31, 1985]

HELSINKI REVISITED

In Helsinki, 35 governments are attending the 10th anniversary of the Helsinki agreement, and most of the democratic governments there are wondering why. For the West, the whole appeal of the 1975 agreement was that it made the Soviet bloc's commitment to human rights, heretofore regarded by bloc countries strictly as their internal affair, open to international review. The West dutifully demanded that these countries respect their new commitment, but most of the countries, and most of all the Soviet Union, refused. In some cases, the Russians perhaps got nastier than they otherwise might have been—hard as that is to imagine—in order to spite those leveling the human-rights demands.

So no one is enthusiastic about Helsinki, but all the original signers seem to be there, including those that are least enthusiastic. There are three good, if modest, reasons. Helsnki is a way for those who care in the West to keep faith with the victims of state repression in the East; these people are not only brave but also lonely—if they cannot have relief, they crave not to be forgotten. The agreement allows Westerners an opening to put a certain pressure for human rights on Eastern governments. And it lets East European governments so inclined—and all of them are at least mildly inclined from time to time—to distinguish their human-rights style from the well-oiled despotism practiced by the Soviet regime.

The painful question remains of what the West can do to reach into the Soviet Union and nurse the cause of human rights there—to do so effectively and not just for show, and to do so without seriously undercutting other substantial Western interests.

Here Western impulse, pointing toward intervention, vies with Western experience, which counsels not neglect but care. In raw East-West times, things get worse, but in easier East-West times they do not necessarily get better, or stay better. "Human rights" in the Western sense is in the Soviet sense a code word for challenge to the communist system. Western governments know this, although not all well-meaning Western individuals take it into account. The Soviet government can be shamed, but its capacity to resist shame is strong. This distinguishes it from East Europe, which shares in the Western humanistic tradition. All this is the bitter lesson of Helsinki.

[From the Christian Science Monitor, July 25, 1985]

WHAT YOU NEED TO KNOW ABOUT THE HELSINKI ACCORDS

(By Charlotte Saikowski)

Helsinki is getting ready for a giant birthday party.

Foreign ministers of 35 states will gather in the capital of Finland Aug. 1 to commemorate the 10th anniversary of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE). The act was signed in Helsinki in 1975 by the United States, Canada, the Soviet Union, and all the nations of Eastern and Western Europe except Albania.

The Helsinki event calls attention to one of the most unusual forums for East-West dialogue. Under the "Helsinki accords," as the Final Act is commonly called, the 35 member states, including neutral and nonaligned nations like Finland and Yugoslavia, gather periodically to review progress toward the goal of easing East-West tensions and promoting cooperation.

Public interest tends to focus on one aspect of the accords: human rights. This is because dissidents in the Soviet Union and East European countries invoke the accords when pressing for greater freedom—and because the West holds Moscow's feet to the fire on human rights violations.

But the Final Act is not only a declaration on human rights. It is a carefully balanced package of principles designed to provide a framework for improving cooperation in many areas, including military security, trade, science, technology, environment, culture, and education.

Although set out like an international agreement, the Final Act does not have legal status and there is no mechanism to enforce it. It is in fact a political rather than a legal undertaking.

A brief history explains why.

The idea was first broached by the Soviet Union in 1954. Because no peace conference followed the end of World War II, the Soviets saw a security conference as a kind of substitute peace treaty to seal the division of Europe and legitimize their wartime gains, including absorption of the Baltic states and the communization of Eastern Europe. The West European nations initially rejected the proposal as an effort to endorse Soviet hegemony over Eastern Europe and exclude the US from European affairs.

But a decade and a half later the European scene had appreciably changed. West Germany had concluded a series of treaties with its eastern neighbors enshrining the postwar borders. An era of détente began to emerge in East-West relations.

The Western nations agreed to explore the possibilities for a European security conference on three conditions: that the status of Berlin is regularized and separate talks to reduce conventional forces in Europe held simultaneously; that the US and Canada also take part; and that "European security" is broadened to include humanitarian concerns.

After three years of negotiation, the Western concept largely prevailed. Moscow had yielded in order to get the conference.

When the Final Act was finally signed, critics cried that the West had sold out to the Soviets. Many scorned it as a collection of wordy declarations. The Americans were ambivalent. Only idealists suggested it marked the beginning of a new era in East-West relations.

Today the optimists are disappointed. But many who criticized it now see its value as a political vehicle to pressure the Soviet-bloc countries to reform human rights practices and liberalize authoritarian systems. The US in particular has become an enthusiastic participant.

From Moscow's standpoint, the Helsinki accords provide tacit European and American acceptance of its wartime territorial acquisitions. But, while the document recognizes the "inviolability" of frontiers, it also says that the frontiers can be changed peacefully by mutual consent. In the Western view, therefore, the document does not freeze the borders of Europe.

Moreover, the term "inviolability" applies to East European frontiers as well. It thus challenges the so-called "Brezhnev doctrine" of limited sovereignty under which Moscow claims the right to intervene in bloc countries to preserve socialism (as it did in Czchoslovakia in 1968).

Helsinki has also provided the Soviets with a forum to press for European disarmament and the end of restrictions on trade with the West. But it has not realized the expected gains from the accords.

A major result of the Helsinki agreement has been the proliferation of informal groups in Eastern Europe to monitor compliance with the human rights provisions. Dozens of groups representing minorities and other dissidents have sprung up to gather evidence and write reports.

The most famous of these has been the "Moscow group" of intellectuals led by Yuri Orlov, Andrei Sakharov, and Anatoly Shcharansky a group now brutally disbanded. Helsinki also inspired such activity in Eastern Europe as Charter 77, a human rights manifesto and civil rights movement in Czechoslovakia.

In the West, too, there is monitoring activity. A special CSCE commission composed of representatives of Congress and the administration—the "Helsinki Commission"—functions in the US. Britian has a similar body. Many ethnic and private human rights groups also keep up pressure on signatory governments to hold the Soviet-bloc countries accountable for human rights violations.

Is it worth it?

Ten years after signing the Helsinki Final Act, no one can claim that the Helsinki process has ushered in a millennium in East-West relations. On the contrary, only limited progress can be recorded.

The Soviets have not changed their behavior in a substantial way. They have allowed some reunification of families, allowed more emigration, and improved conditions for foreign journalists. But progress falls far short of Helsinki standards.

The Soviet Union remains an oppressive society that denies political and economic freedom. Today the dissident community is shattered.

The Warsaw Pact nations have observed the compulsory provisions on prior notification of major military maneuvers. There is somewhat greater openness about military activities, including voluntary exchange of observers at exercises. But it has been difficult to extend "confidence building" measures.

The Helsinki process has stimulated activity in the UN Economic Commission for Europe. Scientific and economic cooperation took a leap in the late 1970s. Some East European states, such as Hungary, have improved facilities for Western businessmen.

But improvements have been spotty. Trade, in any case, declined in he 1980s because of the debt problems of Eastern Europe and recession in the West.

Despite disappointments over the Helsinki process, many believe it is a net plus for the West. They see it as a worthwhile forum in which to spotlight rights violations in the Soviet bloc, relate human rights to cooperation among states, mobilize world opinion, and give moral support to the repressed.

"We are really at the beginning of the history of a new process not only under the Helsinki accords but at the UN," Says Richard Schifter, US envoy to the recent Ottawa experts conference. "We have not been in the habit of commenting on violations of human rights in other countries—in Hitler's and Stalin's time, for example. Only 25 years from now will we be able to determine whether we are at the beginning of an era in which these concepts did take hold and states looked on the actions of other countries and caused them to change their behavior."

Certainly the Soviet leadership can no longer avoid discussion of its "internal affairs." It may sit impassively at Helsinki meetings. It may stonewall efforts to improve agreements or implement them. But the efforts are nonetheless there.

"Helsinki was never seen as a magic lever that would change the Soviet totalitarian dictatorship," says a State Department official. "But one mustn't overlook the impact in Eastern Europe. Even Romania has allowed a massive emigration of Jews."

Says Jeri Laber of the New York-based Helsinki Watch group. "At least the Soviets come to talk and sometime it's the only forum where East-West relations are raised and they have taken a lot of abuse without walking out."

In the eyes of some diplomatic experts, the most important benefit of Helsinki is its positive, unifying effect on the countries of Western Europe, the US, and the neutrals. Whatever the differences among them, they come together on high ground that shows what differentiates them from Soviet-bloc societies. And even nondissidents and governments in Eastern Europe, which would like to have more independence from the Soviet Union, quietly welcome the process.

"The high ground is an attractive high ground even to many whose circumstances are beyond their control on the other side of the fence," says Mark Garrison, director of the Center for Foreign Policy Development at Brown University. "It's an especially useful operation because it's not threatening in any way and encourages them to try to join us if possible on the high ground."

Frustrated over slow progress, many Soviet emigres favor repealing the Helsinki accords, but Western groups do not think withdrawal from the process is desirable.

"The first reason is we lose the best international forum in which to hold them to account for their violations of human rights," says Sen. Alfonse M. D'Amato (R) of New York, chairman of the US Helsinki Commission.

"Where else could we have so isolated the Soviet Union that its responses to our litany of human tragedy, enforced at the hands of Soviet officials, were confined to poorly crafted attacks on US employment, homelessness, discrimination, and medical care problems?"

Also, Senator D'Amato says Moscow would like to see the US withdraw from the Stockholm disarmament conference, leaving itself and the Europeans.

In the opinion of some diplomats, the Stockholm conference—if it ultimatly produces the desired military confidence-building measures—may prove to be the most valuable aspect of Helsinki, reducing the risk of war in Europe.

Comments William Schinn, a former United States State Department official: "We have observers at many Soviet exercises. That has helped heighten confidence and taken away some of the mystery."

One Decade Since the Final Act

1975—The Helsinki Final Act was signed by 35 states of Eastern and Western Europe after three years of negotiations.

1978—The first follow-up conference ended in Belgrade, Yugoslavia. The five-month meeting, attended by 140 delegates, was difficult. It produced only a short document, recording that different views were expressed on the degree to which the Final Act had been carried out and that consensus was not reached on a number of proposals submitted.

Nonetheless, the Soviets could not avoid talking about the suppression of freedom. The conference also gave the East Europeans leverage against Moscow. When the US and West Europeans criticized the Soviet arrest of three prominent dissidents—and Moscow threatened to walk out—the Poles, Romanians, and Hungarians refused to join the Soviets in a vote condemning such criticism as interference in their internal affairs.

1980—The Madrid conference was convened. This second review meeting was suspended for nine months in 1982 in response to the imposition of martial law in Poland. But it resumed, concluding in 1983.

Discussions focused almost entirely on human rights. An agreement was reached that did not go as far as Western members wished but that strengthened the Helsinki process by adding or bolstering language to: ensure the right of workers to organize; speed family reunification; strengthen religious freedom; condemn and supress terrorism; improve conditions for journalists; expand access of private citizens to foreign diplomatic missions.

Under the Madrid agreement, the "zone of applicability" of any such measures will apply to the entire European portion of the Soviet Union, right up to the Ural Mountains, instead of the 250 kilomter-wide band set at Helsinki.

1984—A conference on European military security was convened in Stockholm to develop confidence-and-security-building measures with a view to reducing the risk of military confrontation. It is scheduled to resume in September.

The NATO nations have on the table a package of military measures, including an exchange of annual forecasts of planned military maneuvers and the presence of observers at military exercises. The Soviets are pushing the idea of nonfirst use of nuclear weapons.

1984—A two-week seminar in Venice, Italy, on economic, scientific, and cultural cooperation in the Mediterranean.

1985—A human rights experts meeting was held in Ottawa, Canada. The Soviets refused to engage in substantive preliminary talks and the six-week meeting itself yielded no final document. The Western countries tabled a series of proposals aimed at making the Helsinki provisions more specific.

1985—A six week Cultural Forum attended by leading cultural figures will be held in Budapest, Hungary, in October. It will consider an expansion of cultural exchanges.

1986—A meeting on human contacts—family reunifications and visits, travel, binational marriages—will be held in Bern, Switzerland, in April.

1986—A third major review conference will begin in Vienna in November.

The Three Baskets of Helsinki

The Helsinki Final Act has three basic sections or "baskets," as they came to be known when participants threw in proposals during the negotiations.

Basket I contains the principles guiding relations between states that are defined in the United Nations Charter: respect for sovereignty, nonuse of force, inviolability of frontiers, nonintervention in the internal affairs of other countries, respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, self-determination, and fulfillment of obligations under international law.

This basket also contains military "confidence building" measures, including the prior notification and the exchange of observers during major military exercises.

Basket II calls for cooperation in economics, science, technology, and the environment.

Basket III deals with cooperation in humanitarian and other fields, including freer movement of people and information, cross-border marriages and family reunification, and educational and cultural exchanges.

The Final Act also calls for periodic review conferences to evaluate implementation of the accord and take up new proposals. It designated that the first conference be held in Belgrade in 1977.●

SCOUTS IN SEEKONK, MA, AREA RECEIVE DISTINGUISHED AWARD

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, one of the most impressive programs for young people that I have encountered in my time in Congress is the Duke of Edinburgh Scouting project supervised by Dr. Albert Roy of Seekonk. Dr. Roy's dedication to providing the best possible experience for young people has redounded greatly to the benefit of the young people of the Seeknok area.

I was privileged some time ago to participate in a ceremony at the British Embassy in which the British Ambassador presented Duke of Edinburgh awards to deserving Scouts. Recently, through the great organizational efforts of Dr. Roy and the help of a lot of parents and others in Seekonk, a group of young people went to Scotland to receive their medals from Prince Philip.

I want to salute Dr. Roy for his skill and enthusiasm with which he guides this program. The young people of Seekonk are very lucky to have his support. And I want also to express my admiration for the young people who have participated in the program and have lived up to the high standards embodied by the Duke of Edinburgh awards.

Seekonk Scouts Hailed by Royalty

SEEKONK—For the second consecutive year, scouts of Troop 3 have received gold Duke of Edinburgh medals from Prince Philip at Holyroodhouse Palace in Edinburgh, Scotland.

The presentation was the culmination of a three-year project by Bill Crowley of Scott

Road and Russell Humphrey of Howland Street.

Fiona Lubbock, now of Beckley, West Virginia also received her gold award from the prince. She is the only female member of the Seekonk awards group.

Assisting Prince Philip in the awards ceremony was Sandra Whittaker, who was a member of Britain's 1984 Olympic track team and holds the Scottish record for 200 meters. She later chatted with Seekonk's Crowley, who is a nationally ranked miler.

The highest British awards for excellence in youth, the Edinburgh awards were established 30 years ago and are issued in 40 countries of the British commonwealth, from Australia to Zimbabwe.

The Seekonk scouts are the only Americans involved in the program. Special permission was arranged by having the troop attached to Bermuda for administrative purposes. This is the 11th year of Troop 3's participation.

Meanwhile, three scouts from Rhode Island, two from Connecticut and three from Michigan are being guided through the program by Dr. Albert Roy of West Avenue, Seekonk, American administrator for the awards.●

CUPIDITY IN THE PHILIPPINES

HON. DOUG BEREUTER

OF NEBRASKA

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend to my colleagues' review a recent editorial in the Washington Times of July 25, 1985. Indeed, if we want to avoid battling over funding for Philippine "contras" in a few years, we need to begin now to assist in assuring a democratic successor to the Marcos regime. I certainly hope we can learn and avoid the mistakes made elsewhere by our inaction and the perceptions of our policies and views of the world. Too often, the first steps toward democracy are taken when nations are already too deeply polarized.

The United States can be a strong, positive force in assisting the further development of democracy in the Philippines. Today, as this editorial concludes, democratic government in the Philippines is indispensible and still possible. Hopefully, it will not soon be too late.

CUPIDITY IN THE PHILIPPINES

The Philippines are about to be promoted from problem to crisis. Unless we want to endure, five years hence, House debates on whether to fund Filipino "contras," we had best concern ourselves now with assisting a smooth post-Marcos transition.

This is manifestly our business, as the Philippines' ally and in view of the increasing Soviet naval presence in the Pacific. A high Pentagon official told columnist Cord Meyer recently that if a new regime in the Philippines turned Clark Field and Subic Bay over to Soviet use, "the balance of power in the Pacific would be reversed." Do not doubt it.

The corruption of the Marcos regime has combined with nationalism to galvanize the extreme opposition to President Marcos. For no other reason than the brutality of the police and army that are trying to stamp it out even a brutal Communist insurgency—the New Peoples' Army—has been gaining support in the countryside.

President Marcos still subjects himself to elections of sorts (his present term is up in 1987) and in spite of political and medical problems, he plans to run again. The thrust of American diplomacy should be to deter him and also his ridiculous wife, Imelda. Mr. Marcos has made important contributions to Filipino national destiny. Now he can serve his country best by allowing a mechanism of succession to take shape, with power passing to genuine moderates—those, for example, who belong to the reform group within the government called "We Belong."

The National Endowment for Democracy, an independent agency funded by the U.S. government, has been easing the way for peaceful change in the Philippines by aiding indigenous non-Communist reform movements and labor unions. The Soviet Union, through the World Federation of Trade Unions, never ceases trying to infiltrate and co-opt the labor movement and has been active throughout non-Communist Asia. The NED has been countering this activity through the AFL-CIO's Free Trade Union Institute.

But this effort has itself been a source of criticism, e.g., an article in last Sunday's San Francisco Chronicle implying something covert about this aid (not true). The article leaned heavily on an interview with Filipino Sen. Jose Diokno, who has repeatedly called for an end to all U.S. involvement in his country.

Achieving a democratic future for the Philippines is difficult, but indispensable.●

BASEBALL IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

HON. FRANK R. WOLF

OF VIRGINIA

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, on June 21, 1985, over 75 of our colleagues—including Representatives STAN PARRIS of Virginia, MICHAEL BARNES of Maryland, STENY HOYER of Maryland and Delegate WALTER FAUNTROY of the District of Columbia—joined me in writing Baseball Commissioner Peter V. Ueberroth urging him to let major league team owners know of our support for the return of major league baseball to Washington, DC. Our letter was written to add support to the efforts of the D.C. Baseball Commission, a group formed by the District of Columbia government to promote the city as a site for a major league team.

On July 29, 1985, I received a letter of response from Commissioner Ueberroth, and I would like to share both letters with Members of the House.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, June 21, 1985.

PETER V. UEBERROTH,
Commissioner of Baseball, New York, NY.

DEAR COMMISSIONER UEBERROTH: While most of us are only part-time residents of the Washington, D.C., metropolitan area, we want you to know of our strong support for bringing major league baseball back to the Nation's Capitol.

You may be assured that we are aware of your understandable view that grassroots and not just political backing should be the gauge by which demonstration of support for a team can best be measured in a community. We don't believe, however, that the two are mutually exclusive. So, as grassroots baseball fans—who also happen to be Members of Congress—we urge you to make major league baseball owners aware of our deep commitment to the placement of an expansion franchise in Washington, D.C.

As you well know, the D.C. Baseball Commission has initiated a season ticket drive and provided excellent factual documentation on the reason why the Washington, D.C., metropolitan area deserves one of the new baseball franchises. But beyond the raw numbers of population and buying power and beyond the factors of the vigorous D.C. summer tourist business and excellent public transportation network, we believe that baseball—so much a part of the fabric of American life—should also be part of daily life in Washington, D.C. Many of us grew up with major league baseball and we believe that the people of this area—especially our young people, whose lives can be enriched growing up with the game's sights and sounds—deserve a team.

A famous baseball announcer once said, "There is nothing so truly American as hitting one out of the ballpark." The home runs in this town too often come from a president scoring a political triumph or from a committee chairman steering through an important legislative victory. They should really come from the crack of the bat of a young outfielder or the long, lazy swing of an aging first baseman.

Along with the rest of this great metropolitan area, we miss those real home runs, Mr. Commissioner. Let the owners know—we would like to see baseball back in D.C.

Sincerely,

FRANK R. WOLF,
STAN PARRIS,
WALTER E. FAUNTROY,
MICHAEL D. BARNES,
STENY H. HOYER.

BASEBALL,
OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER,
New York, NY, July 24, 1985.

Hon. FRANK D. WOLF,
U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE WOLF: Thank you very much for the letter in which you joined with a number of your colleagues to urge that Major League Baseball be returned to Washington. I recognize the support that exists for Baseball in Washington, and understand your interest in bringing the National Pastime to the Nation's Capital.

It is my expectation that expansion is likely in the next several years, something that I have indicated in testimony submitted earlier this year in the House and Senate. Moreover, it is clear that Washington is a major contender for an expansion franchise.

As your letter suggests, the final decision on expansion and the location of expansion franchises is left to the owners of the existing 26 Major League Clubs, and I shall make certain—as you and your colleagues requested—that the owners know of your views.

Again, thank you for writing. Best wishes.

Sincerely,

PETER V. UEBERROTH,
Commissioner.●

NAIROBI CONFERENCE MARKS CLOSE OF U.N. DECADE ON WOMEN

HON. CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mrs. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, the recently concluded U.N. Decade for Women Conference in Nairobi, Kenya, endorsed all the principles regarding the role and status of women recommended at the 1984 International Conference of Population in Mexico City. All these were included in a forward-looking strategy adopted at the conclusion of the meeting in the early hours of July 27, 1985.

What amazed me about this important women's conference were the many reports of significant progress being made in developing countries regarding family planning services and education, as well as the desire to implement more such advances. There is little doubt that many Third World governments seriously concerned about the population explosion in their countries, realize the necessity of these types of programs.

Particularly, I was very pleased to hear about the high level of commitment and support that the people of Kenya express in favor of improving access to family planning. Individuals would stop on the street during my visit to the conference and give me encouragement, telling me that they admired the work we were trying to accomplish on behalf of women who want to determine family size and the spacing of their children.

This situtation was made clear in a cogent article written by Werner Fornos, president of the Population Institute, which appeared in the Standard of Nairobi. I provide the article for your attention.

WOMEN MUST BE FREE TO DECIDE ON FAMILY "POPULATION SEVERE PROBLEM"

(By Werner Fornos)

At the conclusion of the United Nations Decade for Women there must be a universal resolve to promote and extend the rights of women and none were more significant than the fundamental human right of reproductive freedom.

Article 13 of the 1984 Mexico City Declaration on Population and Development, signed by the official representatives of 147 nations, focused on the very crux of a severe and expanding global problem.

"By the year 2000 some 1.6 billion women will be of childbearing age, 1.3 billion of them in developing countries. Major efforts must be made now to ensure that couples and individuals can exercise their basic human right to decide freely responsibly, and without coercion, the number and spacing of their children and to have the information, education and means to do so".

One-third of the mothers in the developing world did not want their last pregnancy, according to the World Fertility Survey, the largest social science research project ever undertaken. About one-quarter said their actual family size was higher than their desired family size.

Family planning services, supported by adequate information and education, offer a viable solution to this enormous dilemma and have been shown to contribute substantially to the health of mothers and children and to the quality of life.

Yet 400 million couples in the developing world who need and want such services are deprived of them due to lack of funding.

TRAGIC NUMBERS

This huge chasm between need and fulfillment all too frequently results in tragically high numbers of maternal and infant deaths attributable to such factors as malnourishment, dangerously short intervals between pregnancies, and mother giving birth too early or too late in life.

Twenty five million women worldwide suffer serious illness or complications every year during pregnancy and childbirth. Eleven million of the 133 million babies born every year will not reach their first birthday.

In Africa and Asia, half a million women die every year from maternal causes, leaving behind one million orphans. In some African countries a woman may have to give birth to six children to assure the survival of one son.

Family planning is the first line of defence against unwanted pregnancies, which have indeed reached epidemic proportions worldwide.

Today there are two abortions in the world for every five births. One woman dies every three minutes of complications resulting from septic abortion. And illegal abortion is the leading killer of women between the ages of 15 and 39 in Latin America, and a major cause of maternal mortality in Asia and Africa.

Women everywhere must have nothing less than full equality with men and the opportunity to succeed in all human endeavours on the basis of their ability alone. Gender should be neither a handicap nor an advantage. But before sex discrimination can be given a long overdue burial, it is essential that all women be able to voluntarily and responsibly make the most personal decisions governing their lives.

The current Nairobi conference signalling the end of the U.N. Decade for Women must not fail to address this crucial issue as it works out a forward-looking strategy in the best interests of women of the world and humanity itself.

THE WAGNER ACT AT 50

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues an editorial concerning the 50th anniversary of the Wagner Act. The editorial, from my hometown newspaper, The St. Louis Post-Dispatch, points out what is all too obvious, the National Labor Relations Act no longer protects the rights of workers to engage in and benefit from collective bargaining. I especially commend the last paragraph to my colleagues' attention:

In shaping the institutions that will govern future labor-management relations, unions must play a vital role. Fifty years after the Wagner Act, though, their legal standing is in peril. On this anniversary, the recognition that unions may well vanish should be sufficient to spark efforts to ensure that they don't.

I commend the following to the attention of the Members:

[From the St. Louis Post Dispatch, July 18, 1985]

THE WAGNER ACT AT 50

It's been 50 years since passage of the National Labor Relations Act, which, better known as the Wagner Act, is the set of laws that gave legal standing to labor unions. Thanks to this act—and only this act—unions have been able to fight for the sort of benefits that set the standards that nearly all employers, union or otherwise, have been forced to acknowledge and respect.

"But apart from past achievements, there is little to celebrate on this golden anniversary. In the last few years, labor has taken a beating. Instead of helping fend off the blows, as strict compliance with the Wagner Act would require, the administration instead has installed as enforcers of this law people who strive for its sabotage. Time and again, the National Labor Relations Board has mined the foundations of strong unions. The fact that the Supreme Court last month upheld one of its most egregious decisions—forbidding unions from pursuing sanctions against members who quit during strikes—would appear to set the NLRB's decisions in granite.

The Occupational Safety and Health Administration, charged with ensuring safety at the workplace, has repeatedly failed to follow up on worker complaints, has dropped the number and frequency of unannounced workplace inspections, and has unapologetically sided with management in deciding what shall and shall not be deemed workplace hazards.

There is little room for optimism in assessing labor's future. Congress has passed legislation exempting companies awarded certain defense contracts from compliance with the Davis-Bacon Act. More and more U.S. manufacturers are relocating plants in countries such as South Korea, where labor is extremely cheap and unions (to say nothing of strikes) are outlawed. Fewer and fewer American workers belong to unions, and even those who do are seeing benefits cut and wages frozen. Tiered wage scales, unthinkable in the past, are becoming common.

In this bleak scenario, what is required? AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, in an interview last August with The Wall Street Journal, called federal labor laws a "dead letter" and suggested workers might be "better off with the law of the jungle." He might be on to something. The face of the U.S. work force has changed dramatically in the last five decades. Blue-collar workers account now for less than a third of the working population. More women are working than ever before, and the impact that this change has on society, forcing the development of new approaches to family-rearing, is profound and lasting.

It is clear that new structures must be developed to address new needs, for the contract, written or implied, that exists between labor and business will wither in the absence of fair, reasonable and realistic expectations each party to the contract can make of the other. It is just as clear that such guidance as is needed is likely not to come from government any time soon.

In shaping the institutions that will govern future labor-management relations, unions must play a vital role. Fifty years after the Wagner Act, though, their legal standing is in peril. On this anniversary, the recognition that unions may well vanish should be sufficient to spark efforts to ensure that they don't.●

NEWARK WILL HOST UNITED STATES YOUTH GAMES

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, it is with deep pride that I take this opportunity to let my colleagues know about the United States Youth Games, which will take place this year in my home city of Newark.

The United States Youth Games evolved from a pioneer summer recreational program in 1966 in New York City. That year the New York City Urban Action Task Force, concerned about a lack of organized recreational programs for young teenagers, combined with widespread urban unrest around the Nation, instituted an invitational event called "The Eastern Youth Sports Festival." New York, Boston, and Washington took part in that first competition, and it became the first of the summer sports festivals. In 1967, the AMF Corp. adopted the summer sports competition as a sponsor, and the United States Youth Games came into existence. In addition to offering over 1,000 young people the chance to participate annually in sporting events, the games are the culmination of weeks of competition held in the individual participating cities prior to the games, so they serve to supplement and enhance local municipal recreational programs.

Mr. Speaker, this year will be the first time that the games have been held in the State of New Jersey, and I am very proud that Newark, the largest city in the State, has been selected for this honor. I am happy to insert the following article from the Newark Star-Ledger into the RECORD, and I know my colleagues join me in wishing all the participants in the United States Youth Games the best of luck.

[From the Star-Ledger, Feb. 11, 1985]

YOUTHS TO GATHER FOR OWN OLYMPICS

(By Barbara Kukla)

Move over, Los Angeles! Newark is gearing up for an "Olympics" of its own—the 1985 U.S Youth Games, which the city will host Aug. 6-11. Nearly 2,000 participants, coaches, chaperones and assistants from 14 cities will take part in the 19th annual games, an event in which boys and girls between the ages of 9 and 15 compete in five different sports.

This is the first time that Newark will host the games and the first time that they will be held in New Jersey.

"We're doing it up just like the Olympics," said Leon Garcia of the Newark Department of Recreation and Parks, the national coordinator for the games.

"We have the support of the city council, which is providing the bulk of the financial support, and the mayor (Kenneth A. Gibson) has told us he intends to run the first five miles of our 'Torch Relay.' We anticipate having the opening ceremonies in front of City Hall."

"We are making great strides in our efforts to present a superior program," said Leonard Chavis, director of the city's department of recreation and parks. "A parade, several awards luncheons, sightseeing and entertainment, along with the athletic competition, will be part of the six-day series of events."

Garcia on March 6 and 7 will play host to the coordinators from the 14 participating cities, finalizing details for the games. The visit will include a tour of athletic facilities in Newark and at Montclair State College, led by the coordinators and city officials.

In the meantime, he has met with the principals of the city's public, parochial and private schools to arrange for informational sessions for their students.

"There will be five events—swimming, bowling, tennis, boys' and girls' basketball and track and field," Garcia said.

As a means of preparing youngsters who are interested in participating, Garcia said a series of "developmental meets" are planned for each Saturday in March, April and May. During the first two weeks in June, he said, tryouts will be held and members of the Newark team will be chosen.

Each team will have 88 members and about a dozen coaches, said Garcia. With the assistance of a corps of volunteers and staff members, participants will number about 2,000, he believes.

Garcia estimates that it will take about $360,000 to "house, clothe and feed" the youths and adults who take part. The city council, he said, has provided $50,000 in start-up funds and plans to allow another $100,000, while $50,000 will be donated by the AMF Corp., the national sponsor. Fundraising will account for most of the remainder, he said.

As Garcia explained, the games started in New York City in 1967 to provide constructive activities for youths of the inner city. Over the years, participation has branched out to involve more than a dozen cities.

Newark began participating in 1972, and while the team has never won the national title it has traditionally ranked "among the top four," according to Garcia. Over the past decade, he said, Newark has been considered a strong contender in bowling, basketball and track and field.

Participation, he said, is open to "any youth who lives in a 10-mile radius from Newark."

Serving as overall coordinators of the sporting events are William Wimberly and Vanessa Watson, basketball; Charles Davis, track and field; Patricia Sermon, tennis; James Patterson, bowling, and Steve Doxson, swimming. The coordinator for the Newark team is Harold Wright.

Participating in addition to Newark will be teams from Baltimore, Md.; Birmingham, Ala.; Boston, Mass.; Columbia, S.C.; Charleston, S.C.; East Orange; New Haven, Conn.; New York City; Paterson; Richmond, Va.; Washington, D.C.; Worcester Mass., and Syracuse, N.Y.

As chairman of the city's recreation committee, Councilman at-large Sharpe James said that while activities are being hosted at Montclair State College, "It's key that many of the related ceremonies and events take place within the City of Newark so that the participants come away with a better understanding and perception of Newark."●

KIDNEY TRANSPLANT CENTER AT SOUTH CHICAGO HOSPITAL

HON. CHARLES A. HAYES

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, on August 8 and 9, the Illinois Health Facilities Planning Board will vote in Chicago on whether to approve a kidney transplant center at South Chicago Hospital.

Chicago currently has no renal transplant center primarily available to the minority population of the city—in spite of the fact that blacks suffer from end stage renal disease [ESRD] at a rate 2.6 times higher than that of whites. Whites, however, receive transplants at a rate 2.7 times higher than blacks in Illinois.

The community areas directly served by South Chicago Community Hospital have been officially designated by the Federal Government as medically underserved. This means that the areas served have much higher rates of poor health—higher infant death rate, higher VD rate, higher TB rate, and so forth—than other areas of the city of Chicago and the State of Illinois. This, for example, is reflected in fewer primary care physicians, a rate of 1 primary care physician for 3,417 population for the Southside versus 1 per 2,242 population for the city of Chicago. Black and Hispanic physicians combined, make up less than 2 percent of Chicago's physician population while the minority—black and Hispanic—composition of Chicago's total population is 40 percent black and 13.5 percent Hispanic. The maternal death rate is 22 times higher then the citywide average. The tuberculosis rate among Hispanics in the service area has doubled in the last 8 years. Blacks suffer from ESRD at a rate 2.6 times higher than whites.

The Chicago Health Systems Agency's [CHSA] health plan—1981-84—states that:

> Transplantation is cost-effective and can result in improved quality of life for ESRD patients. This alternative should be available to all medically appropriate patients desiring transplantation.

An appropriateness review of ESRD services conducted by the Chicago Health Systems Agency concluded that while the need standard for transplantation is set at a minimum of 15 transplants per center per year, "the need for this service exceeds fourfold the total number of procedures recomended by this standard."

That same CHSA Appropriateness Review states that:

> Approximately 50 percent of all patients with end stage renal disease are medically suitable for a kidney transplant.

For 50 percent of the 1983 dialysis pool of patients in Illinois to have received transplants, each transplant center would have had to perform 252 transplants. The actual total number of transplants performed in Illinois in 1983 was 243.

In documenting the high level of unmet need for kidney transplantation in Illinois, the CHSA's health plan states:

> The fact that 92 percent of all hemodialysis patients have never been evaluated for renal transplantation clearly demonstrates that there is considerable unmet demand for kidney transplantation services.

The level of unmet need is rising. The incidence of ESRD in Illinois increased by 38.5 percent from 1979 to 1983.

A major barrier to an increased rate of transplantation is the availability of kidneys. The CHSA health plan states that:

> Transplantation appears to be an underutilized alternative to dialysis * * * 43.9 percent of the cadaveric kidneys (obtained in Illinois) are transplanted while 45.6 percent of these kidneys are sent elsewhere; 10.5 percent of these kidneys are not used.
> The Data available through the ESRD Network 15 indicate that during 1983, 81 of the kidneys obtained in Illinois were not transplanted in the State.

One member of South Chicago Community Hospital's joint application, the Chicago Regional Organ and Tissue Bank [CROTE] began operation in January 1983 and as reflected in the ESRD network 15 data, CROTE procured 26 kidneys accounting for 67 percent of the increase in kidney procurement from 1982 to 1983 in the entire State of Illinois.

Transplantation is both the most cost-effective form of treatment for ESRD and the treatment that affords to patients the highest quality of life. Moreover, South Chicago Community Hospital's proposed transplant center will perform transplants at a cost lower than those charged by all existing transplant centers in Chicago. Recent cost figures show an average cost of $56,800 at Rush Presbyterian-St. Luke's Hospital, $38,000 to $40,000 at the University of Chicago Hospital and $31,200 at South Chicago Community Hospital.

> If 10,000 instead of 6,000 transplants could be performed annually, * * * then more than $400 million would be saved * * * Maintaining this transplant level of 10,000 each year would ultimately produce enormous savings, and many more patients would be returned to normal or near normal lives.

Mr. Speaker, let this record reflect that I am strongly in support of the approval of a kidney transplant center at South Chicago Community Hospital.●

ELECTIONS, MEXICAN STYLE

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, those of us who are critical of violations of human rights in other countries have an obligation to be consistent in such criticism. And it therefore behooves those of us who have been critical of the lack of democratic procedures in many nations to comment on the sad spectacle of widespread abuse of basic democratic rights in the recent Mexican election. An editorial in the Washington Post for Saturday, July 20, underlines the dismay that many of us feel that Mexican officials continue to abuse democratic rights by engaging in fraudulent electoral practices. The failure of the Mexican Government to protect the right of individuals to vote, and to have their votes fairly counted, is deeply disturbing and I believe it is important that those of us who believe in democracy let the Mexican Government know how disappointed we are in their conduct in these recent elections.

[From the Washington Post, July 20, 1985]

ELECTIONS, MEXICAN STYLE

It may be that the candidates of Mexico's governing party, the PRI, actually got the most votes in last week's elections in the states of Nuevo Leon and Sonora. But no one may ever know for sure. Ballot fraud was pervasive. Poll watches of the main opposition party, the PAN, were disqualified before the elction or physically ejected from polling places. Voting lists were inflated with duplicate and false names. Some ballot boxes were stuffed. Others were simply snatched away and driven off in speeding cars. These were not isolated practices.

It's dismaying to observe this tawdry performance in a nation that is capable of doing better and at a time when Latin nations with democratic traditions far less robust than Mexico's—the latest example is hapless Boliva—have conducted fair elections. We say this, we trust, in due and humble awareness of past vote fraud in the United States.

In Mexico, vote fraud has been a widely conceded feature of a political system that has, over a run of more than 50 years, brought the country economic growth, political stability and a record of considerable respect for civil liberties. The PRI has won all presidential and nearly all congressional and gubernatorial elections in Mexico since it was formed. Many of its operatives and supporters believe it would be against the national interest for it to lose any major contest.

But Mexico's president, Miguel de la Madrid, made a point of promising beforehand that elections would be fairly conducted. One of the dismaying things about the Nuevo Leon and Sonora elections is that they suggest there are limits to the control the president—a technocrat who has made his career in Mexico City and not in electoral politics—maintains over the local PRI organizations.

Mexico may be at a critical point and is certainly at an uncomfortable point in its gallant effort to whittle down its huge foreign debt and to get its economy in shape for sustained growth. Polls taken before the Nuevo Leon and Sonora contests suggest that the PRI was holding onto a lead in areas where the PAN seemed to have great potential. The massive electoral fraud, by casting doubt on the reported outcome, also casts a shadow over the legitimacy of the ruling party's majorities. That's not helpful for a country that has been working hard at home and abroad to build confidence in itself as a major economic and political power.●

SUPPORT FOR INSURGENCIES

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Foreign Affairs Newsletter for July 1985 into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

SUPPORT FOR INSURGENCIES

In Ethiopia, Angola, Mozambique, Afghanistan, Nicaragua and Cambodia anti-communist insurgents are fighting pro-Moscow governments that seized power in the 1970s. Their struggles pose tough questions for U.S. policymakers. In some cases, the U.S. has chosen to help. We have aided rebels fighting the Soviets in Afghanistan. Congress recently voted aid for the Contras fighting Nicaragua's Sandinista government. Now many in Congress believe we should fund a third insurgency, the non-communist resistance in Cambodia, and some favor funding such insurgencies in general.

The idea of helping anti-communist rebels is attractive. The Soviets have funded armed insurgencies around the world for decades. Why shouldn't the U.S. do the same? For some people, the enemies of our enemy deserve our support. But every insurgency arises from a unique history. U.S. support for an insurgency should be based on a careful evaluation.

Are U.S. national interests served? Support for an insurgency should advance specific U.S. political and strategic goals. We must be clear whether we are committed to the insurgents or whether our support is merely to distract the Soviets. Unless assistance benefits U.S. friends or U.S. goals, public support for the venture will not likely be sustained. Funding a fight against a government we dislike does not necessarily mean our interests will be advanced.

What are the insurgents' chances for success? A successful insurgency exacts a high price from its opponents. The Afghan rebels hold much of the countryside, repeatedly attack major cities and military installations, and have fought the Soviets to a stalemate. The Contras in Nicaragua, on the other hand, do not hold a single town in Nicaragua and have little presence outside of border areas. The Cambodian insurgents have a precarious foothold along the Thai-Cambodian border and their bases inside Cambodia were recently overrun by Vietnamese occupation forces.

Is there broad international support for the insurgents? Such support is an important measure of an insurgency's legitimacy. The U.N. has repeatedly voiced opposition to the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan and the Vietnamese occupation of Cambodia. Pakistan and China, among other states in the region, have cooperated with the U.S. in aiding the Afghan rebels. Several, but not all, ASEAN states would support U.S. military aid to the Cambodian resistance. The European Community and most Latin American states, except those in Central America heavily dependent on U.S. aid, oppose U.S. aid to the Contras.

Do Congress and the American people support sustained U.S. involvement? The American people have a right to know where such aid will lead. Maintaining substantial levels of financial and political support for insurgent movements is problematic. Since its inception, the program to aid the Afghan resistance has had strong public and congressional support. The question of the Contras, however, remains divisive even though Congress now supports "humanitarian assistance" for them. Aid to the Cambodian resistance has not yet been the subject of much debate and it is premature to say a consensus exists.

What does the U.S. hope to achieve? Do we seek to overthrow a government or only to pressure it (and if so, for what purpose)? A negotiated settlement is often our goal. The insurgents and U.S. friends in the region must share our objective. The strength of the Afghan resistance has forced Soviet interest in U.N.-sponsored "proximity talks" with Pakistan. Asian friends acknowledge that, because of the Cambodian rebels' poor military performance, no negotiations with Vietnam are in sight. The Members of the Contadora group (Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia, and Panama) believe that U.S. support for the Contras undermines regional efforts at a diplomatic solution in Nicaragua.

What do we know about those who seek our support? Anti-communist rebels like to call themselves "freedom fighters" but often they do not share our traditions and values. Their behavior is often objectionable even when it is on behalf of goals we support. Afghan rebels seldom take Soviet prisoners of war. The majority of Contra military commanders served in the repressive National Guard under former president Somoza, and we must question their statements on democracy and their human rights practices. Most of the Cambodian resistance fighters are under the Khmer Rouge, which caused the deaths of some 2 million Cambodians during its 1975-79 rule. The non-communist resistance groups are overshadowed by the Khmer Rouge, raising questions about how to keep any U.S. assistance out of its hands.

What are the chances of military escalation involving the U.S.? Each insurgency seeks greater aid and U.S. commitment to its cause, and we must weigh the risks and costs carefully. Increased U.S. assistance to the Afghan rebels threatens Pakistan, a U.S. friend. Increasing Soviet violations of Pakistani airspace and hints of reprisal for supporting the rebels could lead to a more prominent U.S. role. U.S. emphasis on military pressure against the Sandinistas increases their reliance on Moscow and Havana and raises the possibility of escalation. In Cambodia, a direct U.S. connection to the resistance fighters may give the Vietnamese the pretext they have been waiting for to strike into Thailand and crush the resistance camps. Such a strike may lead to pressure for a greater U.S. military role. In all cases, we need to examine the chances of direct U.S. involvement.

Assisting insurgents fighting pro-communist regimes is a complex issue that deserves scrutiny. Short-term political benefits may come from giving aid, but so do risks and costs. We should avoid adopting a formal doctrine or listing explicit criteria for supporting insurgencies. We should make decisions on a case-by-case basis, acting from a clear understanding of how U.S. national interests can be served best. With caution, we can avoid being forced to pursue goals we do not share or that damage our long-term interests.●

HON. JOHN PAUL HAMMERSCHMIDT'S ELOQUENT TRIBUTE TO AMERICA'S DISABLED VETERANS

HON. GERALD B.H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT] was a featured speaker at the recent National Convention of the Disabled American Veterans.

JOHN PAUL HAMMERSCHMIDT's reputation as an articulate advocate for America's disabled veterans is a well-deserved one. His speech in New Orleans was tremendously well received. I think it needs to be read by all of us and I am most pleased to submit it for the RECORD.

REMARKS OF HON. JOHN PAUL HAMMERSCHMIDT AT THE DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS NATIONAL CONVENTION, NEW ORLEANS, LA, JULY 22, 1985

Mr. Commander, distinguished officers, and delegates to this 64th National Convention of the Disabled American Veterans, administrator of veterans' affairs, Mr. Harry Walters, and ladies and gentlemen:

One of my most pleasant congressional activities is to come to a National Convention of the DAV.

At these meetings we review what has recently occurred legislatively in the field of veterans affairs. We renew old friendships and we pledge anew to do that which is right and proper for the veterans of this Nation and their dependents.

And most importantly, we annually renew a pledge towards the hallmark of the DAV which is that our Nation's first and foremost objective is to give the highest priority to that select group of individuals who have been disabled in the service of their country.

Insofar as I am concerned—and I believe I can speak for the entire Congress—that pledge will be honored, will be supreme, and will guide the Congress in all that it does.

The DAV deserves many plaudits today. Its legislative program has been carefully crafted. Its spokesmen on Capitol Hill in Washington are excellent.

Dale Adams, Butch Joeckel, Rick Heilman, Dave Gorman, Ron Drach, Steve Edmiston, and all the others serve you extremely well and the Congress looks to them for advice and counsel.

The DAV—in a larger sense—also deserves other plaudits.

Your corps of national service officers—the vast majority or whom are seriously disabled Vietnam veterans—are second to none in their ability and dedication. The director, Art Wilson, is a fountain of knowledge in veterans' affairs.

The voice of the DAV in Washington is vibrant, strong, and reasoned.

You stick to your singleness of purpose—that the service connected come first.

And you usually achieve your objectives. You do it with facts, with persuasion, and with much persistence. I congratulate you on your efforts and on your accomplishments.

The DAV deserves at least two other particular commendations.

You now have more than 1 million members, which is a phenomenal achievement, considering your membership eligibility rules. How very proud you have a right to be. This great strength speaks loudly throughout the land.

It commands a voice that ought to be, and will be, heard—of that you can be sure.

On a more personal note, let me congratulate you on another matter of great personal pride to the citizens of the Third Congressional District of Arkansas. You have had the good sense and great wisdom to place in your highest office one of our native sons.

Chad Colley is not just our friend. He is an inspirational leader who reminds us daily of what the DAV is all about, what our Veterans' Programs are all about, and what our country is all about.

You will understand then my own pride in being his Congressman. He is the best there is and I congratulate each of you for electing him to the honored position of national commander of the DAV.

Legislative dilemmas abound these days. I can tell you that the Congress needs you and needs your ideas and your ideals. By your example, you give the Congress an impetus to excell. By your faith in the Nation, you give us inspiration to enact just laws and to seek more effective solutions to national problems.

It is no secret that many such problems exist today, particularly with respect to high Federal deficits and huge budgets.

The Veterans' Administration budget is caught up in this difficulty and it will not go away.

The House and Senate Budget Committee conferees continue to try to resolve differences in the manner in which major national fiscal policies are addressed. They involve almost every fabric of our society. The proper amount of money to operate the VA in fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988 is one of these issues still to be decided.

The 1986 House budget includes money for a compensation and pension cost-of-living increase of 4.1 percent. It provides that the Medical Program will operate just as it did this fiscal year.

However, it also calls upon the House Veterans' Affairs Committee to find $300 million in savings.

The Senate budget bill goes further. It would have no COLA for anyone, including Social Security recipients.

It would increase fees on GI loans, establish a hospitalization means test for certain nonservice-connected veterans, and require insurance companies to reimburse the Veterans Administration for nonservice-connected hospitalization.

You need to know that the House and Senate positions are several hundred million dollars apart.

Our problem is to reconcile the difference while hopefully doing no harm to good Veterans Programs. This presents a great challenge and the answers are not easy.

But two answers are not difficult for me at all. Very simply, they are this: If anyone gets a COLA, it's going to be service-connected disabled veterans who will be at the head of the list. And the $300 million is not going to come from the service-connected either.

In addition, I don't want to see the fee on GI loans increased.

However, as to this item alone, if the fee is increased by just 1 percent, it brings $153 million into the Treasury. And so the Senate at least thinks it to be a viable option for the conferees to consider.

Third party reimbursement by insurance companies, coupled with a realistic, easy to manage, limited means test might be a possibility for a House-Senate compromise.

One such plan would bring in over $1 billion in 3 years. Another would bring in even more. If—to achieve a budget that will really attack our high Federal deficit—we must go this route, I am certain the Congress will assure that service-connected veterans will be completely protected, that pensioners will be protected, ex-POW's will be protected, the aged needy will be protected, and quality of care will be preserved for all.

Moreover, the leadership of the DAV would be fully consulted as these proposals are considered—its advice and counsel will be invaluable.

Let me make it clear that no one knows at this time how the budget will be worked out. The thoughts I have expressed are only in the realm of things to be possibly considered.

But we must be realistic. The veterans world cannot be in a national vacuum and we wouldn't want it to be.

If that happened, we might find ourselves in a position of having to accept ill-advised proposals, with little knowledge of their consequences.

I earlier mentioned consultation with your leaders.

Let me dwell on that for a moment. It works for the good of all of us and it works well.

I mentioned where I stand with respect to COLA's for service-connected veterans. As this matter evolved, I consulted with Commander Colley at a congressional hearing as to what would be the position of the DAV if all COLA's including Social Security, were proposed to be frozen for 1 year.

He didn't hesitate to answer. He said that DAV members had responded before to patriotic calls and would bite that bullet by immediately agreeing to giving up COLA's given the fact that everyone else would be treated the same way.

Chad's answer was in the great tradition of the DAV and everyone in that crowded hearing room that day had reason to be terribly proud that their organization had no difficulty putting Nation above self.

It was DAV at its finest.

And there was another time of excellent consultation. It was when DAV learned that some bureaucrat economists at the Treasury Department were giving serious consideration to urging the President—as part of his tax reform package—to ask the Congress to pass law taxing veterans' compensation.

Just let me say to you that this kind of proposal was not made by mean spirited people. It was made by people who had read a lot of books and heard a lot of theories.

But, they had never worn a uniform, and they had never received a wound, they also didn't understand the historic position of our citizenry and they certainly didn't understand the DAV.

The proposal to tax compensation rightfully never saw the light of a single legislative day.

The DAV led a campaign against it that left no stone unturned. Our offices were in daily contact. The Congress was thoroughly alerted. Thousands of your members wrote letters of protest. You were justifiably outraged that any serious thought could be given to such an idea.

Just let me tell you that I have every reason to believe that Secretary Jim Baker at Treasury never gave the idea any credence nor did the President of the United States.

Harry Walters campaigned against it. Sonny Montgomery campaigned against it and so did the entire House and Senate Veterans' Affairs Committees.

And the idea died and was never even presented to the Congress

The DAV rose to its full height during the time of this controversy. It flexed its good muscles. It showed its strength. It did its job and you can be proud—each of you—that you were part of a great effort.

The DAV Auxiliary deserves a share of the credit too. And so do many other individuals and organizations.

But the auxiliary was particularly effective in its letter-writing and in its telephone calls. Congress listens when the ladies speak, for their voice is a loving one and a caring one and also a very convincing one.

The auxiliary deserves another credit. Together with the DAV membership, it lends a tremendous hand to the VA Medical Program by its volunteer activity.

I have seen that activity in visits to scores of VA hospitals and its success is almost indescribable. The VA simply couldn't do its job without it and I congratulate all of you for this great national effort of compassion and love of neighbor and comrade.

And now let me conclude by leaving with you one final thought. The Congress is involved with doing the Nation's will in every field of endeavor.

You are involved in many of these fields and you have a time-honored tradition of contributing to the solving of problems associated with them. I know that you will continue with those contributions.

To do our job properly the Congress needs your assistance, your wisdom, and yes, too your courage. That it will receive all of this is a foregone conclusion.

I believe this to be a mortal certainty for I have walked side by side with the DAV on many issues, and I know of your devotion to the veterans cause and indeed to the cause of this great Nation.

Thank you, my friends, for inviting me to be with you. It's always good to be at a National Convention of the DAV, and to be with my good friend Chad Colley.●

IMMIGRATION REFORM

HON. BRIAN J. DONNELLY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, once again this year, Congress will attempt to reform our Nation's immigration code. In that context, I strongly urge my colleagues to consider the important argument made in the following editorial from the Boston Irish Echo.

[From the Boston Irish Echo, July 27, 1985]

NEW IMMIGRATION LAW NEEDED

Immigrants by the tens of thousands are welcomed each year to our country. Under the current immigration law's preference system, permanent visas were issued among others last year to 20,000 citizens of Mexico, Korea, India, China and the Philippines.

Nearly 8,000 new arrivals came here from Britain.

In 1984, under existing preference rules, only 537 such visas were issued to people from Ireland.

There is something radically wrong in a system that penalizes, no matter how inadvertently, a nation and a people who have contributed so uniquely to America's growth and prosperity.

Since 1820 over 4.5 million Irish men and women have emigrated to the United States. Today, close to 20 percent of America's population can claim some degree of Irish heritage. At the present rate of allowable immigration, however, what took the Irish 165 years to accomplish would now take nine thousand years.

The well-known litany of Irish success stories is virtually endless. In every field from literature, industry and medicine to banking, journalism and the arts, the Irish have given unselfishly of themselves and their talent. America would have a vastly different place without the Irish contribution.

The effect of present day immigration, however, has negatively and unfairly all but closed the door to thousands of Irish who want to emulate their parents and grandparents in finding a new life here.

In 1965 when the laws were changed, severely cutting back the number of Irish allowed into the U.S., Ireland was in the midst of an industrial awakening. Job opportunities, were plentiful and there was little need for the "safety valve" of immigration. Sadly, that is not the situation today. Economic difficulties in Ireland—and through much of Europe—have forced many of Ireland's young people to look anew to America as the land of opportunity. But unfortunately, our doors remain closed to all but a handful of the hopeful.

The controversial Simpson immigration bill is coming up for consideration in the Senate, but that legislation does not address the problems facing the Irish. Its inadequacy as a remedy is underlined by the fact that several national Irish American groups have expressed strong opposition to the measure.

One bill that would effectively open the door wider to increased Irish immigration is currently languishing in the House Judiciary Committee on Capitol Hill. Filed last May by Massachusetts Congressman Brian Donnelly, H.R. 2606 would redress many of the inequities in the preference system and make additional immigrant visas available to the Irish and other nationalities.

The Donnelly bill merits the vigorous support of all Irish and Irish Americans—not only here in Massachusetts but across the country.●

OBSERVATIONS ON POLITICS

HON. LEE. H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, July 31, 1985 into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

OBSERVATIONS ON POLITICS

Politicians are talking about whether a political realignment is taking place in the country that will usher in a period of Republican party dominance. There has not been a realignment since Roosevelt established the New Deal Coalition as the center of American politics, so a realignment would be a historic development. The state of the economy is by far the strongest issue in creating a realignment.

The basic trends are not in dispute. Some kind of political restructuring is taking place. The Democrats have lost political ground and the Republicans have gained. More voters call themselves Republican than in the past and southern whites are clearly switching to the Republican party. The South may not be solid Republican, but it has clearly ceased to be solid Democratic. Except for a few minorities, nearly every group has moved toward the Republican party. Republicans have won six of nine presidential elections since Eisenhower; by 1988 they will have held the presidency sixteen of twenty years. They clearly have a great opportunity; the question for the Republicans is whether they have nailed it down. If they provide policy changes that meet the public mood (tax simplification could be one), they will continue to make gains and the historic realignment may take place. On the other hand, if an economic recession or foreign policy disaster occurs, their fortunes could change quickly.

The Democratic party has become identified as the party of special interest groups. Its problem is how to appeal to the country's white middle class majority without abandoning its historic commitment to the minorities. At the state and local level it remains strong. The question for the Democrats is whether they can build a winning national party from that state and local base. The Republicans have their problems too. They have demanding groups within the party, but their internal divisions are not as severe as those of the Democrats.

So, the Democrats have serious problems and the Republicans have made impressive gains. But the successes of the Republicans under President Reagan are by no means permanent; the President's success, or lack of it, during his second term will determine the durability of his electoral coalition. A realignment is defined by durability, and it is too early to say if the recent trends are lasting. The jury is still out on whether the elections of 1980 and 1984 are like those of 1932 and 1936, which turned out to be critical turning points in American political history. At this point, it is probably correct that no political institution has yet managed to fill the vacuum created by the collapse of the Democratic New Deal Coalition. It is a fluid situation. As one commentator put it, "It is musical chairs and the music is still playing. When it stops, we don't know if the voters will sit in Republican or Democrat chairs."

My view is that there is no decisive evidence yet of a partisan realignment. Elections in this country will continue to be decided by the independent voters who are attached firmly to neither party. They make up a majority of the electorate, and their views are uncertain, changeable, ambivalent and sometimes contradictory. They tend to be centrists in their views, but they are sometimes liberal, and sometimes conservative. Overall, I am inclined to the view that voters are less firmly attached to party loyalties and respond to particular candidates and issues. I doubt if there is a majority party in the country today. But at any given time voters are shifting party loyalties and the key question now is not whether a realignment is taking place, but how much of a realignment is going on and why. The one thing we can be certain of is that whatever changes are underway, they will not be forever. The volatility of the voter is the only permanent feature of American politics.

It does seem to me that American politics is fundamentally changing. The whole framework of political discourse is changing. The central question remains the same: What should the role of government be in meeting the problems of the day, particularly with respect to economic matters. But while the main issue formerly was how much the federal government should expand its role by taxing, spending and regulating, it now is how and where that role of government should be curtailed. This change in the direction of American politics is likely to continue, principally because the budget deficit looms as the great restraint on American politics. It is no longer possible to return to the days of the New Deal or the Great Society when problems in the country were identified and government programs were created to attack them. The big deficits will shape the policy choices of the future whatever the political party or whoever the president. We have entered the period of the new politics of deficits. The climate is austere and the debate centers on cuts, not increases, for particular programs.

The deficit is also the chief weapon to enforce control of spending and to limit the growth of government. With few exceptions political leaders today simply do not advocate new spending programs. They advocated only incremental changes in present programs. A few politically sacrosanct components of the budget—entitlements, defense, and interest payments—absorb such a large part of the budget that the rest of the budget must sustain most of the reductions. The result is that the politics of the deficit forces restraint on the decisions of political leaders. A question for the future is what happens when a recession comes. The traditional way of dealing with a recession is by stimulation through government spending or tax reductions, but those approaches may be shut off because the next recession will occur in the midst of already astronomical deficits and debt. The party in power when the recession comes could be in big trouble with the voters.

POTENTIAL SHORTAGES AND THE RISKS OF BEING WRONG

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues an article which was published in the June 13, 1985 issue of Public Utilities Fortnightly. The article, entitled "Potential Shortages and the Risks of Being Wrong," written by Russell J. Christesen, president and chief operating officer, Ebasco Services Inc., considers the debate over the amount of energy that the United States should be producing in order to prepare for the future. Although the country has enough energy to serve the country today, the possibility of a shortage is a constant threat. I would remind you that only 6 short years ago the gas lines wrapped around the block. I commend Mr. Christesen's article to my colleagues because of his in-depth look at the chance of another severe energy shortage.

The article follows:

[From the Public Utilities Fortnightly, June 13, 1985]

POTENTIAL SHORTAGES AND THE RISKS OF BEING WRONG

(By Russell J. Christesen)

The debate over whether to build new electric generating capacity, or to continue to rely on conservation and increased use of so-called alternate energy sources, continues unabated in the United States. The arguments on both sides are very familiar; indeed, one has a distinct, almost painful sense of deja vu when listening to them. That notwithstanding and on balance, we at Ebasco think the debate is a healthy thing. The issue needs to be examined and discussed in open forum, again and again, until it is resolved. That's the way we do things in a free society.

But . . . is anybody listening?

The answer is probably not the right people, by which I mean the people who really can help resolve the problem before it is in extremis, as the lawyers say.

Not the least of the reasons the right people are not listening is that the debate is being conducted in terms which many of them do not understand. They do not grasp (and probably don't care to grasp) gigawatts, capacity margins, reserve requirements, interconnections, et cetera. These esoteric terms reenforce their vaguely held notions that this is, after all, an electric utility debate, and the utilities and regulators should handle it. Furthermore, the arguments that we should count more on conservation and renewable sources such as wind, solar, and biomass are more readily understood by a lay public and those in government who may be looking for easy answers. These views are reenforced by experiences of the past decade, which saw rates rise inexorably and demand plummet. Finally, many people perceive the nation to be awash in a sea of unneeded kilowatts.

In my judgment they could not be more off the mark. But I hasten to add that their mistakes are partly of our making, because we have not focused the debate at the right level. Understandably, we have argued the case in terms of the effects of capacity shortages on individual or regional electric utility systems, and the publics they serve. While such an approach is perfectly valid from the industry's point of view, I respectfully suggest that the most promising way to focus public and governmental attention on the shortage problem is to cast it in terms of the national interest, rather than the industry's.

We must ask ourselves—as a nation, not merely as an industry—what would systemic electric power shortages really mean to us? What would they do to our economy and to the fabric of our society which, heaven knows, is being torn by so many other problems and differences? Last but not the least, what would such shortages mean to our national security?

The distressing fact is that we don't know what systemic power shortages would mean, because we have never really experienced them. Ironically, the U.S. electric utility industry is a victim of its own success in this respect.

SHORTAGES: WHAT PROBABILITY?

Perhaps the first step in coming to grips with the implications of shortages is to try to determine just how probable they are. After all, if there is no great likelihood that we will experience shortages, why worry about their costs? Some of the most rigorous studies of the relationship between economic growth and electricity have been done in recent years by the Electric Power Research Institute. One recent institute paper provides a sobering prospect of just how close we may be to power shortages.

The EPRI study determined total U.S. utility capacity requirements under the following four assumptions:

(1) Nonutility generation would be 4 percent of the total. It presently is 2.8 percent.

(2) Peak loads are assumed to grow only 92 percent as fast as total annual kilowatthours, due to improved load management.

(3) A 15 percent capacity margin is assumed to be needed for reliability.

(4) Retirements are limited to 30 gigawatts through 2000, which assumes some refurbishing of existing plants.

The study also assumes that all 135 gigawatts of presently planned capacity additions projected by the North American Electric Reliability Council will be completed, and that 15 gigawatts will have been retired by 1993.

It identifies three growth scenarios for gross national product: 2.9 percent ". . . would be the minimum socially acceptable target"; 3.5 percent would be a reasonable medium, and 4 percent would be a high growth rate.

With those assumptions in mind, the study indicates that required capacity additions during the seven years from 1994 to 2000 to be 208 gigawatts for the 2.9 percent GNP growth rate, 310 gigawatts for 3.5 percent, and 400 gigawatts for 4 percent. EPRI then goes on to put those required capacity additions in perspective:

These numbers are sufficiently large that they will be difficult to achieve under any foreseeable circumstance. Even with the low growth of 2.9 percent, by the year 2000 we would need to add 343 gigawatts of capacity, or about 20 gigawatts per year on average. This is roughly twice the present rate planned between 1984–93. The higher GNP growth rates, of course, would require much greater capacity additions.

Finally, the study pinpoints the years at which capacity surpluses disappear for each GNP growth rate. At 2.9 percent it is 1991; at 3.5 percent it is 1988–89; and at the high 4 percent we will have no surplus after 1987!

It is, of course, possible to take issue with these assumptions, particularly those concerning growth of GNP, but refining them does not change significantly the conclusion that capacity surpluses will begin to disappear during the next two to six years. Does it really matter whether we run out in 1988, 1989, or 1990, when all those years are well short of the time frame presently required to plan and build any plant, coal or nuclear, in this country? Arguing or refining those numbers is like rearranging the deck chairs on the Titanic.

Those EPRI numbers and others like them from equally reliable sources are telling us that capacity shortages are indeed very likely. Furthermore, they are saying that shortages may be upon us sooner than we think.

Common sense, to say nothing of national energy policy, dictates that we do something now about the situation.

THE SHORTAGE COSTS

If capacity shortages are a distinct possibility, we had better try to determine their costs to the country; i.e., to society, the economy, and our national security.

The likelihood and costs of shortages will vary due to differences in the nine coordination regions into which the country is divided. These differences include climate, economic growth, and the rate of peak demand growth. According to one EPRI researcher, "The perception of an impending electricity shortage in a particular region vis-a-vis other regions would disrupt business and industry expansion plans in that region and increase overall uncertaintly in other regions as well." So, in addition to their economic costs, shortages could give rise to societal costs in the form of rivalry and political factionalism from one region to another.

While it is extremely difficult to measure "downstream" social and economic costs of systemic shortages—i.e., the costs of such things as jobs lost, reduced economic output, shrunken tax bases—a number of individual studies have produced numbers that can only be described as scary. Here are a few examples of what it costs not to have an industrial or commercial kilowatt-hour where and when it is needed:

Oak Ridge Associated Universities studied outage costs for six industrial plants in the Tennessee Valley Authority region and found minimum total costs averaging between $286,000 for a one-hour once-per-year disruption to $734,000 for a three-hour outage occurring ten times per year. The range of costs varied by a factor of ten over the six plants, with the highest cost exceeding $1.5 million for the three-hour, ten-in-a year case.

Mathtech analyzed the environmental and socioeconomic consequences of a shortage of installed capacity for various duration interruptions to a chior-alkali plant and a pulp and paper plant. A 15-minute outage to the chior-alkali plant was estimated at $18,000 or $3.6 per kilowatt-hour. The same outage to the pulp and paper plant was estimated at $55,000, or $4.4 per kilowatt-hour.

Ontario Hydro has reported outage costs for a 20-minute disruption of $1.93 per kilowatt-hour for retail trade, $6.72 for an office building, and $174 for large farms. A Swedish study reports outage costs of $5.72 per kilowatt-hour for retail establishments and $11 per kilowatt-hour for offices for disruptions of momentary length through eight hours' duration.

If you assume that the average cost today of producing a kilowatthour where and when it is needed in the U.S. is in the range of six cents to ten cents, it is readily apparent that the costs of shortages are very much greater—anywhere from 15 to hundreds of times greater!

And this speaks only of economic costs. There would also be very large social and political costs and dislocations. In addition to the regional factionalism mentioned previously, shortages would pit different classes of customers against each other, and this would be reflected in the political process.

Shortages would also underscore the existing polarization in our society between the haves the the have nots, the rich and the poor, management and labor, and others, because it would be a competition for resources that would almost certainly be resolved, or at least approached, in populist fashion.

The risks which shortages pose to our national security are also obvious. Not only might they cripple our military capabilities directly, they will also materially affect the industrial production needed for an adequate national defense.

So, while we cannot determine the costs of shortages with precision, it's a very good bet they would be large enough to produce strains in our society and economy, and if allowed to continue, could undermine its stability.

THE "RISK-TO-RISK" RATIO

In my opinion, the country simply cannot afford not to know the approximate size of those shortage costs or risks. We must quantify them on some reasonable, rational basis. That's the first step.

The next step is to compare these estimated shortage costs to the known costs of some modest degree of overbuilding and overinvestment in our electric power resources. Such costs are already known because we are experiencing them right now. They may be justified on the basis that demand, given the economic uncertainties we face, is impossible to predict exactly. Therefore, we have to be conservative and build in a small margin of safety, as well as a reserve margin, in our capacity planning.

Third, we need to compare these estimated shortage costs with the known costs of overbuilding to arrive at what might be called a "risk-to-risk" ratio. All the evidence to date suggests that this ratio will be large, which is to say the costs of systemic shortages to our society and economy are very much higher than are the costs of modest overbuilding.

Finally, we have to communicate the implications of that ratio to our leaders in government, to the press, to the regulatory community, and to the public. Consider how useful such a ratio, with all its underlying information, could be to a National Commission on Electric Power, such as that called for recently by the Edison Electric Institute and the National Association of Regulatory Utility Commissioners.

As a nation, our past experience in dealing with important national problems as they emerge—rather than when they are full force upon us—has not been encouraging, but we must try. The risks of being wrong are simply too great to do otherwise.●

THE 100TH BIRTHDAY SALUTE TO ROSE VIOLET BRYANT

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of my colleagues a very special centennial commemoration. This Sunday, August 4, Mrs. Rose Violet Bryant of Indian Head, MD, will gather with her many friends to celebrate her 100th birthday.

Rose was born in Vienna, VA, not far from Wolf Trap on August 4, 1885—the year in which Grover Cleveland succeeded Chester A. Arthur as President of our Nation.

Rose and her late husband, Caleb Maltby Bryant, were married in Rockville, MD, on April 15, 1905 and spent 61 happy years together. Rose and Caleb set up their home in Indian Head, MD, in 1913 and it is in this home that Rose now resides.

Rose has remained socially active with the Worthy Matron of Grace Chapter of the Eastern Star, No. 21, for the past 68 years. Ever civic minded, Rose has voted in every Presidential election since American women gained their suffrage in 1920.

It is with pride that I salute Rose on this happy occasion, and I thank her for all she has done to serve our great Nation.●

A BILL TO EXPAND THE AVAILABILITY OF HEARING-AID COMPATIBLE TELEPHONES

HON. NICHOLAS MAVROULES

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. MAVROULES. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced a bill that expands the availability of hearing-aid compatible telephones. My bill would require that all telephones sold in the United States be hearing-aid compatible.

Alexander Graham Bell, the inventor of the telephone, once said he would rather be remembered for his work with the deaf than as the telephone's inventor. Technology has now produced special telephone equipment for the disabled, including small devices in the receiver of the phone that makes it compatible with hearing aids.

Yet, despite this available and relatively simple technology, people with hearing aids still have limited access to the telephone because not all phones are equipped with the device. Whether at home, at work, or on vacation the hearing impaired, just like everyone else, must have access to a telephone.

Phone manufacturers have stated that adding the compatibility device to the receiver can be done at no significant cost to the manufacturer. Right now all pay phones are equipped with a hearing-aid compatibility device, and the average consumer does not notice any difference. But, to those with hearing impairments, it makes all the difference in the world.

My bill does not dictate the technology that must be used to equip the phone with a hearing-aid compatibility device. Rather, I encourage technological advancement on the hearing-aid compatibility question. My bill also would not require any phones to be retrofitted. Only phones manufactured after enactment would be effected by the law.

More than one-third of all Americans over 65 wear hearing aids. And many younger citizens have hearing impairments. Whether we like it or not, most of us will confront a hearing impairment of some kind. And, all of us will have some occasion to communicate with a hearing-aid user. H.R. 3099 will ensure, in a cost-effective manner, that hearing impaired citizens have access to all telephones. I urge my colleagues to support this bill.●

DENY MFN STATUS TO ROMANIA

HON. DENNY SMITH

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. DENNY SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my opposition to the continuation of most-favored-nation status for Romania. While I am normally supportive of the administration's foreign policy, I take issue with the President's notification to the Congress on June 4, 1985, of his intention to grant MFN status to Romania for another year.

Under provisions of the Trade Act of 1974, MFN status for a Communist country is closely linked to that nation's emigration policies. Romania's policies in years past have been costly and obstructionist. Even now, family reunification remains difficult.

The situation for Jews seeking to emigrate is particularly disturbing. Only 543 Jews were allowed to emigrate to Israel during the first half of 1985, half as many as allowed during the same period last year. Before Romania received MFN status, an average of 4,000 Jews a year were allowed to emigrate. Obviously, the emigration situation is not improving.

Although Romania is a signatory of the Helsinki human rights accords, it has an appalling record of human rights violations in other areas as well.

I am very concerned about religious persecution by the Ceausescu regime. According to reliable sources, those practicing their religious beliefs are continuously harassed. Churches are destroyed, internal visas are denied to clergy, and no building permits for new churches are being granted. It has also been reported that legal shipments of Bibles have been recycled into toilet paper. These are outrageous actions by a regime that has pledged to uphold the freedom of religion for its citizens.

Restriction of emigration and religious persecution are not the only human rights violations. The repressive treatment of the Hungarian minority continues unabated.

The time has come to end MFN status for this nation that flagrantly violates the very terms under which such status is supposed to be granted. That is why I have cosponsored House Resolution 234, a resolution disapproving the President's recommendation to extend MFN status to Romania for another year. I urge my colleagues to join with us in condemning the human rights record of the Ceaususcu regime.●

PASSAGE OF THE CONSUMER RAIL EQUITY ACT IS ESSENTIAL

HON. VIN WEBER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to announce my cosponsorship of the Consumer Rail Equity Act, H.R. 1190. This legislation is important to those of our Nation's railroad shippers that are captive to single railroads for service, to consumers of a variety of goods and products, and to our electric ratepayers in many sections of our country, including my State of Minnesota.

In 1980, the Congress of the United States deregulated competitive railroad traffic and granted railroads contracting authority in the Staggers Rail Act of 1980. At the same time, however, Congress recognized that some shippers do not have the benefits of competition and directed the Interstate Commerce Commission to assure that the railroad rates paid by those shippers are "reasonable." I must say that the record of this Commission in implementing this mandate of Congress has been dismal. Since 1980, the Commission has found no rate charged to a captive railroad shipper to be "unreasonable." Many captive shippers have complained to me that the rates they pay are indeed unreasonable and have provided evidence to support their claim.

I support the judgments made in the Staggers Rail Act of 1980. Clearly, we should remove Government regulations from all industries where competition exists. However, Government has a responsibility to protect citizens from monopoly pricing power. After a careful review of the provisions of the Consumer Rail Equity Act, I am convinced that this legislation will assure that the judgments made by the Congress in the Staggers Rail Act of 1980 are implemented appropriately by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the Consumer Rail Equity Act to the attention of my colleagues. I believe this legislation is worthy of their support. I would hope that the Transportation Subcommittee of the House Energy and Commerce Committee will soon turn its attention to this important legislation.●

MR. REAGAN HAS IMPOSED A TAX

HON. JACK BROOKS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, much attention has been given to the claimed reluctance of this administration to increase taxes upon our citizens. What in reality is occurring is an increase in the taxation of the present and future generations to compensate for the fiscal irresponsibilities of the current administration.

While the President is not willing to face up to the real effects of his policies, more responsible administrations in the future will be required to do so at outrageous costs to working Americans, our children and grandchildren. Mr. Reagan seems to take great pleasure in protecting the vested shelters of his wealthy associates and supporters while ignoring the monumental debts he is amassing, and all the while reducing services to our ordinary citizens and our deteriorating infrastructure.

An excellent commentary of this phenomenon appeared on the editorial pages of the Washington Post today. I am pleased to submit it for inclusion in the RECORD today:

MR. REAGAN HAS IMPOSED A TAX

President Reagan believes that he saved you from a tax increase this summer when he demolished the Republican senators' budget plan. But did he? Look again. He has imposed a different tax, and it is now in place.

The Reagan administration is now borrowing more than $200 billion a year to finance its budget deficit. Somebody is going to carry that burden. Who? President Reagan has spared you the kind of tax that Congress enacts—the kind that is predictable, limited and distributed with some concern for fairness. By ruling out that kind of a tax this year, he has only ensured that the Debt Repayment Tax of 1985 will be of another kind.

One possibility is a surge of high inflation. Many people in this country already assume that the solution to the accumulating burdens of federal debt will be simply to inflate the currency again, as in the 1970s. In that case, those debts will be paid off by savers and investors as they watch the value of their money shrink. Inflation is a hidden tax but a real one—and it falls blindly, with no consideration of ability to pay. The Reagan economic program was supposed to encourage savings and investment. Instead, it is making saving and investment much more risky.

But perhaps that surge of inflation will never happen. Fear of it is now sufficiently widespread that at the first hint of it interest rates will soar. Lenders and investors lost gigantic amounts of money in the inflation of the 1970s, and they will send interest shooting upward as they attempt to protect themselves from a repetition. If that happens, instead of inflation there will be a long and severe recession. In that case the tax will be paid by the working people who lose their jobs and the companies that go bankrupt. The Reagan economic program was supposed to generate a steady rise in employment and expansion for business.

In either case, Americans are also going to have to carry the foreign debts that this country is now running up because of its unbalanced domestic economy. The Commerce Department announced yesterday that the trade deficit in June was, once again extraordinarily high. The longer Mr. Reagan lets these debts continue to rise unchecked, the heavier the repayment taxes will ultimately become.

The next tax has already been enacted, by a mechanism that—unlike Congress—is not open to argument and appeal. The only question is the precise form of the tax, a detial that will eventually become clearer. This week Mr. Reagan prevented Congress from trying to devise a tax of its own. He has guaranteed the alternative—a tax that is blind, unfair, unforgiving and hostile to every element of the stable prosperity that Mr. Reagan originally hoped to build.●

ALLEGHENY COUNTY/AUTHORITY CITED FOR RANKIN PROJECT

HON. JOSEPH M. GAYDOS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development recently cited Allegheny County in Pennsylvania and its redevelopment authority [RAAC] for achieving a national "first" under the Federal Rental Rehabilitation Program [RRP].

The county and the authority were recognized as being the first in the Nation to complete the rehabilitation of a structure under RRP, which was authorized in amendments to the HUD Act of 1983. The amendments set aside $150 million for fiscal 1984 and 1985 for the improvement of multifamily rental structures in the low- to moderate-income range.

A plaque commemorating the achievement was presented County Commissioners Thomas Foerster, Pete Flaherty, and Barbara Hafer, and Alfred M. Lento, chairman of the board for the redevelopment authority, by Michael G. Zerega and John Susi, officials from HUD's Pittsburgh office.

The project which brought Allegheny County officials national attention is a six-unit structure in the Borough of Rankin. In all, the county is involved in the rehabilitation of more than 90 such units at a total cost of $1.1 million.

This work is being completed through the cooperation of various county units including the redevelopment authority, the housing authority, and the department of development.

Mr. Speaker, completion of the Rankin project is another example of what can be accomplished through the coordination of efforts by Federal, county, and local officials. It is a pleasure, therefore, to join HUD in publicly recognizing the work of Allegheny County and its redevelopment authority under the Federal Rental Rehabilitation Program.●

NEVER AGAIN

HON. WILLIAM J. HUGHES

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, today I rise once again to join many of my colleagues in decrying a brutal injustice. A mere 40 years ago, the Nazi war machine was finally stopped, but only after Hitler's satanic vision of a Judenrein Europe had, for all intents and purposes, been realized. Throughout the world we shocked citizens of conscience vowed, "Never again!" Today, as the Soviet regime is working to make its dream of a Judenrein Soviet Union reality, we must remember our solemn vow. Mr. Speaker, there is little time to waste. We cannot let the cry "never again" ring hollow.

We have heard that there is a vanguard of 400,000 brave refuseniks demanding rights for themselves, and for their approximately 2½ million Jewish brethren in the Soviet Union. Yes; we have heard the numbers, yet they mean little. What we often need is to hear the stories behind some of these people to add meaning to the math. Most of us have indeed heard the tragic tales of some of the more well-known refuseniks. Yet, for sure, everyone of the 400,000 has his own story of suffering.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to share with my colleagues some tales they may not be familiar with.

Iosif Lokshin is 1 of the 400,000. After receiving an invitation from Israel in 1979, Iosif applied to emigrate with his family in 1979 and again in 1980. He was refused both times. Unable to leave, Iosif became active in Jewish cultural activities and Hebrew language study. Then the harassment started. He was called for army retraining at age 39, and was repeatedly warned by the KGB to cease his Jewish activities.

After ignoring the warnings and participating in a protest demonstration, Iosif was arrested and sentenced to 3 years at a labor camp. In prison, Iosif became ill and was unable to fulfill his work quota. Instead of being given medical attention, Iosif was put on a punishment diet. Such a diet has killed many prisoners in Iosif's camp, but somehow he held on. Later, Iosif was repeatedly put into solitary confinement for extended periods of time. Finally, he was released in June 1984, after completing his sentence. Yet, while Iosif is no longer held within prison walls, he remains trapped behind the Iron Curtain. The tyranny of the prison system is no longer, but the oppression of the Soviet system remains.

Vladimir Tsukerman is 1 of the 400,000. In 1978, Vladimir's wife and child left the Soviet Union for Israel, expecting that Vladimir would follow shortly. Instead, Vladimir was denied exit and fired from his job. In 1981, Vladimir was arrested. The charge was "organizing mass disturbances." What had Vladimir done? He had dared to wear a placard saying, "Let me go to my wife and son." Soviet justice dictated 3 years at hard labor. Vladimir completed his sentence in 1984, yet he is far from free in the true sense of the word.

Such incredible tales do help us to fathom how much human suffering is represented by the figure 400,000. This is the importance of the Congressional Call to Conscience Vigil for Soviet Jews. These efforts wake us, often shock us, and constantly remind us. The Call to Conscience is a most important beginning. Let us heed this call and rise to meet our challenge. Let each of us, in whatever manner he thinks best, exercise his power and expend his energies on behalf of those languishing with no one to represent them.

Mr. Speaker, to this day the Soviet Union continues to treat the practice and study of Judaism as a crime and denies Jews the right to emigrate, in direct violation of the Helsinki Final Act, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and basic humanity. In the face of such continued Soviet efforts to destroy the spirit of its Jewish community—a community which represents 20 percent of the world Jewish population—we cannot remain passive. Forty years ago we were silent, and humanity sank to depths previously unimaginable. If we can salvage one thing from the tragedy of the Holocaust, it is the lesson that silence in the face of inhumanity is tantamount to complicity. We cannot allow ourselves to forget a lesson that came at so high a price.

Mr. Speaker, the Jews in the Soviet Union are our brothers in the struggle for freedom and dignity. We must be our brothers' keepers.●

OPERATING SUBSIDY FOR FOREIGN BUILT VESSELS

HON. WALTER B. JONES

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, today, at the request of the administration, I, with others, am introducing H.R. 3141, a bill to amend the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, to authorize the foreign acquisition of subsidized U.S.-flag vessels.

In 1981 the administration ended the Construction Subsidy Program. To grant relief to U.S. vessel operators who needed to build new and efficient vessels in order to compete in the U.S. foreign trade and who could not afford to build these vessels in U.S. shipyards without any construction subsidy, Congress created a temporary statutory "window" in which Congress could obtain authority to acquire vessels overseas and still remain eligible for operating differential subsidy [ODS].

As a result of this temporary window, 36 waivers have been issued and 25 new vessels have been added to the U.S.-flag fleet according to the Maritime Administration. The window period ended on September 30, 1983. The administration, through this legislation, is now proposing to make the build-foreign authority permanent.

At least two concerns face the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries if build-foreign authority is made permanent and the balance of the maritime promotional legislation remains unchanged. The concerns for the U.S. shipbuilding industry, which is directly affected by the proposal, and concerns for the effect on the unsubsidized competitors of ODS operators, are based on the same theme—the lack of balance. As imperfect as the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, has become, its longevity and success over many years was attributable to the balance it achieved among the many, frequently divergent, maritime interests. Labor and management; subsidized and unsubsidized operators; shipbuilders and ship operators; all functioned in a state of regulatory equilibrium. Without judging whether the Nation has ultimately benefited from the arrangement, or whether the Government should have intervened to the extent it has, the fact remains that we chose to promote the maritime enterprise and 50 years worth of investment policy and management patterns have developed in reliance on the balanced maritime promotional programs.

I do not mean to imply that once established, Government programs must remain unchanged. But once a need for change is established, the change must be accomplished in the context of the overall economic, trade, and strategic policies that are in place at the time.

The bill introduced today does not fit the criteria outlined above, but is introduced, by request, to initiate the debate that, by necessity, will contemplate the balance that is the cornerstone of sound maritime policy.●

WHY CUBA AND NICARAGUA MATTER

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, we do not often consider how critical the Central and Latin American states can be to the global balance of power. Americans tend to take notice only when our national security interests there are revealed by the involvement of distant European powers in the region.

There was the Zimmermann telegram, and all that it revealed about imperial German machinations in Mexico to distract and endanger the United States and keep it from entering the fighting in Europe in World War I. German agents in Cuba instigated revolts in 1917 to disrupt production of sugar, required by both America and its European allies; the United States was required to land Marines on Cuba as a result. In the Second World War, a fantastic amount of Allied shipping was sunk in the Caribbean. Enemy submarines, which were not operating from Cuban or Nicaraguan ports as they could now, but from the Bay of Biscay 4,000 miles distant, sank 260 merchant ships in the Caribbean between January and August 1942 alone.

A series of such critical but forgotten strategic facts appear in Dr. Harold W. Rood's volume Kingdoms of the Blind (1980), and in his detailed essay on Cuba in the National Review (November 27, 1981). Similarly, and more recently, the excellent nationally syndicated columnist Jeffrey Hart has addressed the problem of "Mr. Reagan's strategic alarm about Soviet penetration of Cuba and Nicaragua," by turning to historical example. His analysis of Nazi policy in Latin America, particularly Uruguay, is a revealing brief on how a distant enemy might attempt to use such countries for themselves and against the United States in times of war or peace. The column by Mr. Hart follows.

[From the Washington Times, June 24, 1985]

ROOSEVELT, REAGAN, AND LATIN AMERICA

(By Jeffrey Hart)

In the summer of 1940, Franklin D. Roosevelt confronted a problem in Latin America that in many ways resembles the one with which President Reagan is now wrestling. Mr. Reagan, a Roosevelt supporter who frequently invokes the memory of FDR, would be fascinated by the parallels.

In the summer of 1940, with the sudden collapse of the supposedly formidable French army, Hitler stood at the English Channel and loomed over the continent of Europe. The catastrophic defeat of the Axis a few years later may cause us to forget how bleak things looked that summer.

The situation, with Britain standing alone between America and the Nazi forces, was in fact a major factor in causing FDR to seek a controversial third term that fall.

In June, as a bipartisan move, he had picked Republicans Frank L. Knox and Henry G. Stimson as secretaries of the Navy and War. In July, he told Mr. Knox that we must prepare and lose no time about it. And then the view most pertinent to us today: FDR told Mr. Knox that as soon as Germany had consolidated its gains in Europe it would proceed to penetrate South America—and that we then would have our work cut out for us in this country.

What Mr. Roosevelt had in mind was an impressive German economic and cultural penetration of the region, already under way, which could then provide the foundation of military cooperation.

Uruguay was to be the headquarters for the organization of the German economic effort. It was not a pipe dream. In 1940, more than 55 percent of Latin American exports went to Europe: Brazilian coffee, Peruvian tin, Argentine beef. Latin America needed the income from those exports, even to a Nazi-dominated Europe.

As FDR could see clearly, a Europe consolidated under Hitler and run from Berlin would be a powerful economic entity as well as a military one, and it could—and no doubt would—use its economic leverage to penetrate the Southern Hemisphere further.

Uruguay already had been invaded by German agents. Twelve of them led by a man named Julius Dalldorf and operating under the German minister, Otto Langman, had been arrested by the Uruguayan authorities in June.

The German plans rested on a promising ethnic situation. There were large German and Italian colonies throughout Latin America, especially in the vital ABC powers—Argentina, Brazil, and Chile. More recently, these communities have provided a haven for Nazi war criminals. There were riots between Nazi and anti-Nazi mobs in La Paz and Montevideo. Under American pressure, Colombia's government-owned airline, Avianca, fired all its German employees. Ecuador expelled the Italian mission for subversion. Mexico threw out Hitler's man in Mexico City, Arthur Dietrich.

Nevertheless, much of Latin America inclined toward the Axis until it became clear that Hitler was losing. In the summer of 1940, it was not clear that he could be beaten at all, and he had numerous disciples in Latin America, such as Argentina's Juan Peron.

In 1940, Hitler's interest in conquering England was secondary. His principal goal was to conquer Russia, seize its resources, destroy Bolshevism, and consolidate a Germanic continental empire. He in fact became startlingly close to doing so. Had he succeeded, his empire would have been a formidable economic and military force.

FDR saw all this. He would have been even more alarmed had he known that Hitler had already approved the German navy's "Z Plan" and given the orders for construction of a large surface fleet capable of operating on a global basis.

There is little doubt that FDR would share Mr. Reagan's strategic alarm about Soviet penetration of Cuba and Nicaragua. Again, a continental empire has designs on the hemisphere.

President Reagan knows that, even if many congressmen do not.●

A TRIBUTE TO MISS HELEN E. WOLFE

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues in the U.S. Congress the achievements of Miss Helen E. Wolfe, my constituent from Sunbury, PA, who is being honored on September 4 at a dinner hosted by the board members of the John R. Kauffman, Jr. Public Library for her many years of service to the library and community.

Miss Wolfe retired as librarian of the John R. Kauffman, Jr. Public Library on June 1, 1985, ending a full-time career with the library that spanned more than four decades. I say full time career because I understand that Miss Wolfe is now serving in an advisory capacity to train new personnel.

Miss Wolfe began her career at the library on a part-time basis in 1940 and was appointed to the position of librarian on April 11, 1953. In 1961 she received the Certificate of Provisional Librarian from the Pennsylvania Library Association and in 1970 received the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, Department of Education's Certificate of Public Librarianship. During her distinguished career, she held positions of ever increasing responsibility. She has served as president and secretary-treasurer of the West Branch Chapter Library Association, and at the State level served 3 years on the board of directors of the Pennsylvania Library Association. Her committee work within the association is equally noteworthy as she has served on its nominating, awards and membership committees.

Accomplishing all of these activities would seem to be enough to satisfy most of us in a lifetime, but for Miss Wolfe the list of achievements goes beyond her library work. In additional to currently serving on the Advisory Council of the North Central Library District, she serves on the Shikellamy School District's Citizens Advisory Art Committee and its Library Committee. She is also an active member of the Sunbury Business and Professional Women's Club.

Miss Wolfe has also devoted 40 years of her life as a Sunday school teacher at the Otterbein Church and, as is characteristic of this community-oriented individual, has served on her church's building, nominating, and pastor-parish committees.

I wish to extend my congratulations to Miss Wolfe for her remarkable efforts for the Kauffman Public Library and her community. She has truly enriched the lives of all who been privileged to know her and work with her.●

CRIMINAL JUSTICE SUBCOMMITTEE REPORT ON PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO CIVIL AND CRIMINAL PROCEDURE RULES

HON. JOHN CONYERS, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, last April 30, the Supreme Court sent to Congress several proposed amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. Pursuant to the Rules Enabling Acts, those amendments will take effect tomorrow, August 1, absent legislation to the contrary. The purpose of the delayed effective date is to give Congress an opportunity to review proposed changes before they take effect.

The Criminal Justice Subcommittee, which I chair, has reviewed the proposed amendments transmitted by the Supreme Court on April 30. A hearing explored in detail several of the proposed amendments. Three representatives of the Judicial Conference of the United States spoke in support of the proposed amendments, and three other witnesses—two University of Southern California law professors and an attorney with the New York City Legal Aid Society—criticized various of the proposed amendments. In addition, the subcommittee received written comments from several other persons.

The subcommittee met today and decided, based upon the testimony at the hearing and the written comments, not to recommend legislation modifying, abrogating, or postponing the effective date of any of the proposed rules. The subcommittee instead voted to adopt a report indicating, with regard to each of the proposal amendments that was criticized, why the subcommittee decided not to recommed legislation. This report will be printed and made available to the public through the offices of the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice, room 362, House Office Annex II, Washington, DC 20515.

Only a few of the proposed amendments were controversial. With regard to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure two proposed amendments were criticized.

Civil Rule 52(a) sets forth a standard of "clearly erroneous" for appellate courts to apply when reviewing district court factfinding. The proposed amendment makes it clear that this standard applies even if the finding is based upon documentary or other evidence that does not involve the demeanor or credibility of the witness. The report indicates that no legislation was recommended because it appears likely that the proposed amendment will affect a limited number of cases. If the proposal has a broader or more frequent impact, however, I would expect the subcommittee to take another look at the matter.

Civil Rule 83 regulates the promulgation of local rules and "standing orders." The proposed amendments seek to provide greater public participation in the drafting of such rules and orders and to ensure greater conformity by such rules and orders with the national rules. The criticism of the proposed amendments has been that they do not go far enough. The report indicates that no legislation was recommended because the matter is presently under consideration by the Subcommittee on Courts, Civil Liberties, and the Administration of Justice, which is working on legislation to revise the rules Enabling Acts.

Three proposed amendments to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure were criticized. Criminal Rule 6(e) sets forth a general rule of grand jury secrecy that prohibits disclosure of matters occurring before the grand jury, and provides for some exceptions to that rule. The proposed amendment to rule 6(e) seeks to add a new exception and to expand an existing exception. The report indicates that the subcommittee decided to address grand jury secrecy problems during its work on grand jury reform legislation and not to recommend legislation to modify, abrogate, or delay the effective date of the proposed amendment to rule 6(e).

Criminal Rule 11(c) requires that a judge inform a defendant who wishes to plead guilty or nolo contendere of "the maximum possible penalty provided by law." The proposed amendment adds language that specifically requires the judge, when so informing a defendant, to include that restitution can be imposed. The drafters of the proposed amendment, as they explain in the committee note, do not believe that the rule, as it would be amended, requires the judge to specify the amount of restitution, or an upper limit. The report indicates that no legislation concerning this proposed amendment is being recommended because the committee note cannot alter the clear meaning of rule 11(c).

Criminal Rule 35(b) regulates motions for reduction of sentence. The proposed amendment modifies the rule to conform it to current court interpretations of it. The critics do not believe the proposed amendment goes far enough. The report indicates that, given the rather short life expectancy of rule 35 (it is repealed when the bulk of the Sentencing Reform Act's provisions take effect in November 1986), the subcommittee is not recommending legislation to modify, abrogate, or delay the effective date of the proposed amendment.

The report also expresses views on two aspects of the rulemaking process. The subcommittee believes that, in view of its long experience with rule changes promulgated under the Rules Enabling Acts, its views might be helpful to the Subcommittee on Courts, Civil Liberties, and the Administration of Justice. The two matters commented upon are first, the role of the Supreme Court as promulgator of rule changes, and second the supersession clause, which provides, in effect, that rules supersede enacted statutes.●

HENRY J. DeSIMAS, JR., TO RETIRE FROM U.S. POSTAL SERVICE

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to draw attention to the achievements of one of the 32d District's exemplary citizens, Henry J. DeSimas, Jr., who is retiring after a distinguished career in the U.S. Postal Service.

One of California's native sons, Hank DeSimas was born and attended primary schools in San Pedro. A graduate of Loyola University with a major in business administration, his educational achievements also include postgraduate work at UCLA in the advanced management program.

Before starting his career with the Postal Service, his 3 years of active duty in World War II left him with numerous citations, including the Bronze Star for Valor, the Meritorious Service Medal, the Purple Heart, the Combat Infantry Badge, and campaign ribbons with nine battle stars and a bronze arrowhead. He retired after 27 years in the Active Reserve as a lieutenant colonel.

Hank started his postal career in 1946 as a letter carrier in San Pedro. Since then, he has moved up through the ranks and held various positions of increasing responsibility, including director of personnel and superintendent of the North Long Beach Station. From 1973 to 1982, he served as management sectional center manager/postmaster, Long Beach, CA. In this job, he had 23 postmasters reporting to him and was directly responsible for 3,600 employees, 89 facilities, and a budget of over $100 million. These challenging positions led up to what was surely one of the highlights of Hank's career when, in 1982, he was appointed Olympic program manager for the U.S. Postal Service. He was largely responsible for his organization's highly successful and financially profitable efforts during the Los Angeles Olympics.

Hank was honored by the Postmaster General in Washington, DC and presented with the Partners in Progress award in 1984. In May of this year, he received the Postmaster General's highest award for Executive Achievement, an award for performance which is accompanied by a check for $10,000.

Hank actively participates in civic affairs and functions, and has been on the boards of directors of both the Downtown Lions Club of Long Beach and the March of Dimes. His service includes participation in the National Association of Postmasters, the United States National Association of Postal Supervisors, the Loyola Alumni Association, and the Reserve Officers Association.

Mr. Speaker, although Hank DeSimas' retirement from his present assignment in the employee involvement/quality of work life process for the western region will most certainly be the loss of the U.S. Postal Service, I am confident that California's 32d District will continue to benefit from the endeavors of one of its most selfless community servants. My wife, Lee, joins me in saluting Henry J. DeSimas, Jr., and we wish him, his wife Pat, their eight children, Kathy, Diane, Henry, James, Thomas, Debra, Daniel, and Kimberly, and their 15 grandchildren all the best in the years to come.●

BRAILLE EDITION OF PLAYBOY MAGAZINE

HON. VIC FAZIO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, on July 18, 1985, the House debated and passed the legislative branch appropriations bill for fiscal year 1986. During our deliberations, Congressman CHALMERS WYLIE offered an amendment to delete $103,000 from the appropriation to the Library of Congress for its National Program for the Blind and the Physically Handicapped. This is the amount that he estimated would be devoted to producing the braille edition of Playboy magazine.

I opposed Mr. WYLIE's amendment at that time on the grounds that his effort amounted to censorship. Further, that the decisions on which publications should be produced in braille is best left up to those who utilize this service, the blind themselves, which is the way the program currently works.

I very much regret that the Wylie amendment passed. I have taken several opportunities to express my views, and I would like to also place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the views of others who have spoken out on this matter. I think that the Members of the House of Representatives should take time to read the following statements and articles:

AMERICAN COUNCIL OF THE BLIND,
Washington, DC, July 23, 1985.

Re: Library of Congress funding for braille edition of Playboy Magazine.

On July 18, 1985, the House passed an amendment to its FY 1986 legislative branch appropriations bill which reduces funding for the Books for the Blind and Physically Handicapped program by $103,000. (Cong. Rec., July 18, 1985, at p. 19659) The purpose of this amendment was to prohibit the Library of Congress from producing a braille edition of Playboy magazine. Since 1970, Playboy magazine, published without advertising, pictorial material, or picture captions, has been available free of charge to blind readers who are eligible for the Library of Congress' Braille and Talking Book program. Other magazines such as the Ladies Home Journal, Better Homes and Gardens, the National Review, the Atlantic and Sports Illustrated are also available in braille or recorded editions through the Library of Congress program.

The American Council of the Blind believes that blind persons should have the right to read what we choose, and that censorship has no place in a free society. Any material distributed to the public at large should not be censored when transcribed into braille or recorded form for blind readers.

Since 1931 the Library of Congress has provided first in braille and then in recorded form reading material to blind persons and has attempted to represent in its collection a broad range of material appealing to many interests. This is as it should be, since blind and visually impaired people are as diverse as society itself. Playboy was included in the program at the request of blind people, and continues to be very popular among the approximate 1,000 readers who receive it each month.

The question is simply whether blind persons should have access to a wide range of contemporary thought. Playboy is one of 36 magazines produced in braille by the Library at reader request and we believe that the blind persons who use this service are in the best position to determine what they wish to read.

Both the American Library Association and the Association of American Publishers have joined with us in opposition to the House's action on July 18. Please let me know whether we can count on your support for full funding for the Library of Congress Books for the Blind program so that blind Americans can be assured that we will be able to read what we choose.

Very truly yours,

J. SCOTT MARSHALL,
Director of Governmental Affairs.

STATEMENT BY COUNSEL TO PLAYBOY MAGAZINE

On July 18, 1985, the House of Representatives approved an amendment to the $1.3 billion appropriations bill for congressional operations (H.R. 2942). The amendment cut $103,000 from the appropriation to the Library of Congress for its National Program for the Blind and Physically Handicapped, an amount it was estimated would be devoted to producing a braille edition of Playboy Magazine.

Playboy Magazine has been published monthly for thirty years. During that time, not one single issue has ever been found obscene by any state or federal court. In the eyes of the law, Playboy Magazine stands on exactly the same footing as the Reader's Digest, the New York Times Magazine, and every other lawful publication. In fact, the courts have held that Playboy Magazine does not meet even one of the three tests a publication must meet before it can be found legally obscene.[1] Taken as a whole, Playboy does not appeal to the prurient interest, does not contain patently offensive descriptions of sexual conduct, and does have serious literary, artistic, political or scientific value.[2]

The law is crystal clear that Congress cannot discriminate between lawful publications on the basis of their content. Any other rule would be intolerable in a free society because discrimination on the basis of lawful content would enable the party that happens to be in power at the moment to suppress publications whose views that party deems unwise. If that were the law, one Congress could suppress The Nation, and the next Congress could suppress, instead, The National Review.

As the Supreme Court has said, "above all else, the First Amendment means that government has no power to restrict expression because of its message, its ideas, its subject matter, or its content." Police Department of the City of Chicago v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92, 95 (1972). In fact, the most firmly established principle in the law of the First Amendment is that government may not discriminate among speakers because of the content of their speech.

The House amendment deleting funds from the Library of Congress' braille program was openly motivated by a desire to restrict the access of blind Americans to Playboy Magazine because of Playboy's content.[3] After the vote in the House of Representatives, Representative Wylie, the sponsor of the amendment, explained to the Washington Post that "Playboy assails traditional moral values. . . . I believe that promoting the reading of Playboy in this way does lead to undesirable activities." This content-based censorship of the reading material available to blind citizens is plainly unconstitutional.

It is not any more constitutional because access to a federal program, and a government subsidy, is involved. The Supreme Court, speaking through Justice O'Connor, earlier this month reaffirmed that "those justifications cannot save an exclusion that is in fact based on the desire to suppress a particular point of view." Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc., 53 U.S.L.W. 5116 (July 2, 1985)

[1] Before government may suppress speech as obscene, the Constitution requires that " 'the average person, applying contemporary community standards' would find that the work, taken as a whole, appeals to the prurient interests, . . .; [that] the work depicts or describes, in a patently offensive way, sexual conduct specifically defined by the applicable state law; and [that] the work, taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value." Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15, 22 (1973).

[2] For the most recent case holding that Playboy Magazine is not obscene under each of the Miller criteria, see the decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in Penthouse International, Ltd. v. McAuliffe, 610 F.2d 1353, 1364-1373 (5th Cir. 1980).

[3] See Cong. Rec.-House, July 18, 1985, at H 5932-H 5935.

(emphasis added). The constitutional safeguards of free speech and equal protection of the laws would be violated "if Congress were to discriminate invidiously in its subsidies in such a way as to '"aim at the suppression of dangerous ideas."'" Regan v. Taxation With Representatives of Washington, 103 S. Ct. 1997, 2002 (1983); see id. at 2004 (Blackmun, J., concurring). Representative Wylie's amendment is therefore explicitly based on uncontitutional viewpoint discrimination.

For over half a century, Congress has provided funds to the Library of Congress to enable the nation's library to set in braille at least a few of the approximately 11,000 magazine published in this country. (The program currently provides sufficient funding to set 36 magazine in braille.) Not once during that long and proud history has Congress ever attempted to dictate which magazine must, or must not, be set in braille. Instead, Congress has wisely left the selection of magazine to the judgment of the Library of Congress and the blind Americans that program is designed to serve. Since 1970, representatives of the blind community have consistently included Playboy Magazine as one of the magazine they most want to read.[4]

Why is that? It is certainly not for the pictures, because only the text is set in braille. Perhaps it is because Playboy has for years published some of the very best fiction published in this country. Indeed, this year Playboy Magazine won the distinguished National Magazine Award "for excellence in fiction."[5] Where else can the blind have access to the fiction of writers such as Gabriel Garcia Marquez, John Le Carre, Saul Bellow, Isaac Asimov, and Joyce Carol Oates.[6] Perhaps the blind select Playboy because Playboy publishes candid interviews of individuals whose views or actions are of considerable interest or importance to the blind. Recent issues, for example, have contained interviews with then President Carter, and with Malcolm Forbes, Presidential candidate John Anderson, Lech Walesa and Dan Rather.[7] But whatever their reasons, the blind have decided for themselves what they want most to read.

The rights that would be most severely infringed are thus not those of Playboy, which will still be read each month by over 15 million sighted Americans, but the rights of blind people to read what they choose. That right to choose is fully protected by the Constitution, Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748 (1976); Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1969), and Congress may not constitutionally strip blind Americans of that choice.

THE BLAND FOR THE BLIND

Tough luck, blind folks. For you there will be no more Playboy magazines in Braille from the Library of Congress.

Congressman Chalmers P. Wylie has caught you.

And put a stop to it.

With the consent and approval of the entire House of Representatives of the United States.

And of all decent, right-thinking people, too, I'll bet.

Imagine it—I am speaking now to the unblind—imagine blind people, American blind people, reading Playboy by moving their fingertips over it.

Make your blood boil?

All right, so the famous Playboy pictures—those disgusting pictures—are not reproduced in the Library's Braille editions.

Thank Heaven for small favors. Is that what you say? Well, our House of Representatives was not so easily satisfied, because what about the infamous Playboy party jokes?

What about the vile Playboy Advisor with his licentious hints on what to do about—well, this—and that?

Trenchant questions were confronted in the House of Representatives.

"Is the Honorable Member telling this House that the Braille edition does not make it possible to visualize the most minute details of the Playmate of the Month by application of fingertips to, ah, shall we say—?"

"Unfortunately, no. Only the reading material is reproduced. Infamous party jokes, vile Playboy Advisor hints, interviews with American Presidents discussing lust they have felt in their hearts."

Cries of "shame! shame!"

Party jokes. Lust.

These are concepts that outrage the House of Representatives. The disclosure that blind people were being exposed to them was maddening.

Speaker O'Neill was hard pressed to defeat motions for renting more mercenaries to overthrow the Nicaraguan Government, which was assumed to be in cahoots with the Soviet Union in a plot to destroy the moral fiber of America's blind with Braille Playboy party jokes.

Many a Member reminded the press gallery what Lenin had said:

"Today party jokes, at the fingertips of the blind; tomorrow the novels of D.H. Lawrence in the hands of women and college girls."

Speaker O'Neill blocked resolutions calling for the immigration bureaucracy to hound D.H. Lawrence out of the United States, but only after testimony from Congressman Wylie that D.H. Lawrence had been dead for many years.

Throughout the turmoil Congressman Wylie remained the very bedrock of responsible literary criticism. The distinguished Ohioan Republican, known in his native state as "the Buckeye Sainte-Beuve" (sometimes "the Buckeye Longinus" or "the Buckeye Edmund Wilson"), refused to be drawn into debate about licentious jokes and vile advice.

The facts were sufficient. Government money paid for Braille editions of 36 magazines selected by blind readers for their literary merit.

"I do not feel that Playboy meets those standards," Mr. Wylie announced.

He was referring to the literary standards of journals like Good Housekeeping and Popular Mechanics, which are also produced in Braille at Government expense.

The usual bleeding hearts were heard from:

"Censorship!" they cried.

"Who are we, in spite of our infinite wisdom, to decide that the blind are entitled to expensively produced magazines, telling how to build bird houses, and how to dust behind radiators, but not to magazines telling how to use bird houses and radiators to make one's sex life more fulfilling?"

Congressman Wylie noted that the question at issue was not the type of advice to which the blind were entitled, but the literary quality of its donors.

While it was true, he noted, that officially approved magazines in the 1930's had split a great many infinitives in such articles as "How to Build Your Own Autogyro" and "Seven Keys to Tastier Macaroni and Cheese," both Popular Mechanics and Good Housekeeping were better edited nowadays and certainly more literate than Playboy, which often contained interviews with politicians.

Congressman Wylie emphasized that not all blind people enjoyed reading Playboy in Braille. This produced astonished cries from the House floor:

"Do you mean many of them are just as pure, upright and clean-living as you and I?"

Congressman Wylie said such was the fact. Since they would be depriving only a few—and those few, people of inferior literary taste—the Members readily voted the Braille Playboy out of existence.

Thus do the blind lead the blind.

TUNNEL VISION

The Library of Congress usually gets fairly generous treatment from the legislative branch when budget time rolls around. But the House of Representatives has now voted to cut $103,000 from the institution's appropriation. This is what it costs the library to produce Playboy magazine in Braille.

Playboy is one of 36 magazines produced for the blind. Among the others are Fortune and Jack and Jill. Librarians and groups representing the blind choose the titles. No, Playboy's centerfold and other photos do not make it into the braille edition.

Rep. Chalmers Wylie spurred this move. "We have a budget deficit," he said in defending this action. We know. And $103,000 won't cure it. Such a pointed reduction is not economizing but censorship, a kind of legislative nannyism that treats the handicapped like children.●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference.

[4] It has been suggested that Playboy decides which portions of the text of Playboy Magazine will be set in braille. That is not true. Playboy exercises no control whatsoever over the selection of text. Under a copyright licensing agreement executed in 1970, Playboy has given the Library of Congress permission to set the text of Playboy Magazine in braille. Playboy charges nothing for that permission.

[5] That award is given to one magazine each year by the American Society of Magazine Editors, in conjunction with the Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism.

[6] The list of persons who have contributed fiction and other articles to Playboy includes, in additon, Ray Bradbury, Arthur C. Clarke, Justice William O. Douglas, Laurence Durrell, Graham Greene, Sen. Philip A. Hart, Sen. Vance Hartke, Ernest Hemingway, Martin Luther King, Jr., Norman Mailer, Bernard Malamud, Sen. George McGovern, Vladimir Nabokov, Isaac Bashevis Singer, John Steinbeck, Paul Theroux, and John Updike.

This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

SENATE—Thursday, August 1, 1985

(Legislative day of Tuesday, July 16, 1985)

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Almighty God, sovereign Lord of history and nations, You are needed here: Your presence—Your mercy—Your judgment—Your wisdom—Your love. We need You in this formidable arena of controversy, conflict, and compromise, where unnumbered agendas converge and demand attention—where special interests collide—where strong wills clash. We need You when tempers rise, emotions boil, frustration enervates, and suppressed anger explodes.

Gracious God, in this vortex of the storm where personal, local, regional, national, international, special issues, and interests concentrate, give to the leaders, the Senators and their staffs grace exceeding the tempest. Somehow make it possible for them to enter recess without an undue burden of unfinished business. They do not recess to play games but to work harder than ever. Help them midst heavy schedules to tend to their own health and welfare and that of their families. In the name of Him Whose peace the world cannot give nor take away. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished majority leader is recognized.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, under the standing order, the two leaders have 10 minutes each unless reserved or yielded, then special orders not to exceed 15 minutes for Senators SIMON, PROXMIRE, KERRY, and BUMPERS, and routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 11:30 a.m. with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each.

Following morning business, the Senate will turn to the consideration of the conference report to accompany H.R. 2577, the supplemental appropriations bill. I hope we can complete that by 1 p.m. From 1 p.m. to 3 p.m., we will have a discussion of the various farm bills pending in the Agriculture Committee and hopefully at that time have some reliable cost estimates from various sources—CBO, OMB, USDA—so that we can focus on the various programs.

I must say, we only have a very few items remaining before we recess this evening or tomorrow before we begin the August recess. It could come this evening, I believe, if we can get a budget resolution. I know we have a conference starting at 10:15 and the Democrats have a caucus starting at 10:30. We will discuss the budget conference positions at that time. If that can be resolved and the supplemental appropriations can be resolved, that would leave the energy and water appropriations bill, the South Africa conference report, and the Genocide Treaty.

I am advised that it will take some time on the South Africa conference report, and as soon as that is confirmed we can make a judgment on that. But, if it is going to be extended discussion, it would be my hope we might call up that conference report, file cloture and go home, because I think it would take a number of days, into the next week, as I understand it. But I can advise the distinguished minority leader later on or early afternoon.

So I am prepared, if we can put it all together today, to complete action today. If not, hopefully by early afternoon tomorrow.

Mr. President, I reserve the balance of my time.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALLOP). Under the previous order, the democratic leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my time be reserved for me during the day throughout the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR SIMON

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SIMON], is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

HIROSHIMA REMEMBRANCE DAY

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, this coming week, on August 6, when we are not in session, we will be noting the 40th anniversary of the dropping of the bomb at Hiroshima. Since that horrible display of weaponry, we have amassed more and more and more power. We are moving toward nuclear confrontation, at least I think that is the judgment of most people. And somehow we have to move away from that. We have to move away from it in ways that do not jeopardize in any way the security of our country nor the security of the Soviet Union. We have to start negotiating. My hope is that we can, as a first step, negotiate a verifiable comprehensive test ban treaty.

In any event, this body, our counterpart on the other side of the Capitol, and the administration ought to make a high priority of moving away from the present course. The present course ultimately means that these young pages here and all their counterparts all over this Nation and this world have a grim future. We can build a bright future, but it is absolutely essential, in order to build that bright future, that we negotiate away from the arms race which piles up more and more and more weapons of destruction.

Anniversaries can be good things or anniversaries can be bad things. I see the Chaplain on the floor. Sometimes when I attend church anniversaries I think they are not a good thing because they seem to say how good we are and pat themselves on the back.

The 40th anniversary of Hiroshima is not an occasion where we want to say how good we are. It is an occasion when we ought to say somehow we have to move away from piling up more and more and more weapons, because ultimately someone, somewhere, is going to light the match.

There is one safe way to deal with that, and that is to find verifiable ways of moving away from the arms race. I hope this body, the other body, and the President can move us in that direction.

Mr. President, I asked for this special order relating to Hiroshima Remembrance Day because the Senate will be in recess on August 6, the 40th anniversary of the atomic bombing of Hiroshima. The destruction of Hiroshima ushered in a new era in warfare, and I hope a new era in the conduct of international politics. While many of us rejoiced at the rapid close of World War II, we were skeptical that such enormous uncontrolled power could long keep the peace. Just after the war ended, Albert Einstein said: "Nuclear weapons have changed everything except our way of thinking." Unfortunately, Einstein turned out to frighteningly accurate—year after year, weapon after weapon.

Anniversaries are important. In 1985, we have already witnessed the 40th anniversary of the victory in Europe and the first successful atomic test in the desert of New Mexico. On August 6 we will note what is surely one of the most momentous of all dates—the destruction of Hiroshima by the first wartime use of nuclear weapons. Hiroshima was followed 3 days later by the atomic destruction of Nagasaki. And that second blast has so far been the last explosion of such terrible weapons fired in anger. But we would be complacent in the extreme if we were to assume that these two nuclear strikes were necessarily the last.

We stand on the brink of a qualitatively new and far more dangerous cycle of the arms race. The Reagan administration has embarked on one of the greatest arms race follies ever contemplated: the star wars space shield, the so-called strategic defense initiative. Every major premise of this program is faulty. SDI will not bring about a radical reduction in United States and Soviet offensive nuclear arms; it will instead increase the number of weapons necessary because both sides will require more weapons. It will not reduce the chances for a first strike; it will instead ensure that the Soviet military targets our orbital lasers early so that their nuclear weapons can get through the shield. And their weapons will shift to warhead that do not enter space. SDI will not make the world a safer place; it will instead raise the stakes in a crisis. Both sides will feel the necessity of quick and catastrophic action against the satellite "eyes and ears" essential to preserving military communications and nuclear launch-detection capabilities. And computers—which can malfunction—will make the ultimate decisions. The premium could shift to firing first, because there may no longer be the sure knowledge we each have today, that a first strike will invite a counter strike. In any event, nuclear weapons will still be delivered by suborbital or conventional means: a 1 megaton bomb could easily fit on the back of a standard-sized pickup truck.

There are other follies now under pursuit by both superpowers. We have our MX; Moscow has its SS-18 and SS-24. Our latest folly just arrived the other day, when the administration refused to join with the Soviet Union in a 5-month moratorium on nuclear tests and the Senate could not even agree to ask the President to resume talks. Even if the Soviets have conducted a number of extra tests in the past few weeks or months, what possible additional knowledge could they have gained in these tests? What kinds of militarily useful information could they have gleaned, that we could not with 40 years of testing and experimentation under our belt? A gesture of this sort could do wonders. Article 6 of the Non-Proliferation Treaty calls for the superpowers to make significant progress toward general and complete disarmament. Instead we push ahead with our test schedule as if a missed test spelled the end of Western civilization.

A comprehensive test ban treaty is verifiable down to exteremly small levels, and, with cooperative measures such as in-country tamper-proof seismic sensors, there is virtually unanimous sentiment that a good treaty could be negotiated with ironclad verification provisions. Why not take that first step toward fulfilling article 6 and meeting the aspirations of all the world's peoples? Why not engage in negotiations to stop all nuclear testing for all time? While no one would argue that an agreement banning tests will stop the arms race, it is clear that a treaty would dramatically slow the qualitative arms race and pave the way to reduce the numbers of missiles and warheads now spiralling out of control.

Mr. President, there are many arms control initiatives currently receiving attention in the public arena. Some are good ideas, others are less worthy. But it takes political wisdom, and political courage, to take that first step away from future Hiroshimas. We have spent the past 40 years moving closer to nuclear holocaust, devising new weapons programs and new strategic doctrines. When President Eisenhower met with Premier Khruschev, the two world leaders discussed the problems posed by nuclear fear. Eisenhower told Khruschev that when budgets are drawn up, his military come to him and say that they need more and better weapons to keep up with the Russians. Khruschev told the President that it was the same with Soviet defense spending: his military had to keep up with the Americans. And so it has been ever since.

We have legitimate differences with the Soviets. There are some disturbing trends under way, in the political and the military spheres. In the final analysis, however, we must put aside our fears and our concerns, and sit down with Moscow and negotiate over our differences. We have done it before on several occasions, and we can do it again. We owe nothing less to ourselves, our children, and to the legacy of Hiroshima.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, and I ask that the time not be charged to the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 11:30 A.M.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I note there are still three special orders remaining. I hope that in view of the conferences by both the Republicans and the Democrats—the Democrats starting at 10:15 and the Republicans at 10:30—that Senators might be able to abbreviate statements so that we can recess following the last special order until 11:30 a.m. I have cleared that with the distinguished minority leader.

I hope that Members who have special orders would come to the floor quickly and abbreviate their remarks because I know the Presiding Officer and others want to attend the conferences.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, following the execution of the final special order, the Senate stand in recess until the hour of 11:30 a.m. today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, is there a particular order that I have to get unanimous consent to change in the sequence of speakers this morning?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to speak out of order and proceed under the special order that was arranged last evening.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR BUMPERS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BUMPERS] is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

FORTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BOMBING OF HIROSHIMA

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I join my distinguished colleagues, Senator SIMON and Senator KERRY, in speaking this morning in commemoration of the 40th anniversary on Tuesday of the dropping of the bomb on Hiroshima. Incidentally, the Friday following next Tuesday, celebrates the 40th anniversary of the second nuclear bomb, which was dropped on Nagasaki. It was on that day that the world found that there was a power that we thought previously had been reserved to the Almighty. That was the ability to destroy all mankind.

Unfortunately, when we developed this power, we did not develop the wisdom of the Almighty to control it.

As Einstein has said, and has been quoted literally thousands of times, "The unleashed power of the atom has changed everything save our modes of thinking, and we thus drift toward unparalleled catastrophes."

The dropping of that first bomb on Hiroshima can be debated all you want. I only speak as one who was a 19-year-old marine aboard ship heading toward the invasion of Japan, so it is not necessary to say what my personal feelings were at the time.

I might also say—and I have said this on the floor before but this is an appropriate place to repeat it—the first year I was Governor of my State, I had the opportunity to go to Kansas City and I spent an hour with President Truman. I began to tell the President what a terrible job being Governor of Arkansas was, that I did not like it, that I did not like the pressures, that it was a lot more than I bargained for.

While I was sitting there lamenting about what a difficult job being Governor of Arkansas was, it suddenly dawned on me that I was talking to the man who had made the most awesome decision made by any American. That was the decision to drop the first bomb.

So I am not going through that exercise on the morality of the dropping of that bomb as I explain my position, and, in my opinion, it has probably saved untold millions of lives since that day.

But the dropping of that bomb started a clock ticking. Either we had to find a way to live with our friends and our adversaries and our enemies without the resort to major armed conflict, or we certainly would bring upon ourselves the final disaster.

We should not feel guilty as a nation over the development of the atomic bomb, though it is appropriate to be remorseful and sad. But had we not developed the bomb, someone else surely would have, and by now everybody would have had it anyway.

The bomb hastened the end of World War II, and there are varying estimates about how many Japanese and American lives would have been lost in a full-scale invasion of Japan. Probably as many as 2 million men and women.

But. you know, the dropping of that bomb has also served a very, very salutary purpose: It has brought Europe the longest uninterrupted period of peace since the beginning of man.

So in that sense, we owe a great debt to Hiroshima and Nagasaki. If it had not been for their tragedy as told by the gruesome pictures, and even the more gruesome personal accounts that we have seen in the past week, especially in Time and Newsweek, then the terrible destructive power of nuclear weapons might still be an abstraction on some scientist's drawing board.

You can look at a glazed desert floor where a test fused sand together and made the desert a glass floor. But you cannot compare that and the impact it has on our thinking with the impact of the twisted buildings and the poignant stories of Hiroshima and its residents.

With this awesome power which the world possesses comes great responsibility, and unhappily that has not been mankind's strong suit. We have avoided any further use of these weapons in anger, but that is about all you can say. And as long as nuclear threats are made and as long as one nation with a traditional adversary has the bomb and the other one does not, it is only natural that the other one wants it. As long as nations continue to use atomic diplomacy, the demand for these weapons is going to be irreversible.

It goes without saying, but it needs to be said over and over again, those two bombs on Hiroshima were in the 13- to 14-kiloton range. The world now has 50,000 nuclear weapons and hardly any of them that small, For the record, 1,000 kilotons is one megaton. A thousand kilotons is one megaton, and that was a 13-kiloton explosion in Hiroshima, and 5- to 10-megaton weapons are not unknown today.

Originally, we thought that an atomic bomb was just another weapon to be placed in our arsenal. We even seriously considered using them in Korea. President Eisenhower was strongly urged to use the atomic bomb from time to time. We considered using atomic weapons early in Vietnam. Fortunately, Presidents Truman and Eisenhower and their successors resisted all overtures to use this horrible weapon in anger. So, instead, we have developed the doctrine of deterrence. That is, that nuclear weapons should exist to deter certain types of behavior.

In the infancy of this doctrine, which was Eisenhower's New Look policy of massive retaliation, we leaned too much on deterrence. We let our conventional weapons go almost ignored and we said, "If anybody jumps on us, we will simply nuke 'em." That was our policy for several years. But we soon learned that nuclear weapons cannot deter everything, so we began to rebuild our conventional forces. Deterrence is a perfectly legitimate policy but in the long-run, it is not the ultimate solution.

I want you to look at the odds. If you believe, as many people do, that in any given year, there is a 1-percent chance of a nuclear war, that means that in the next 40 years, there is one chance in three that there would be such a conflict. And the longer you look into the future, the bleaker it gets. At 1 percent, the odds of nuclear conflict within 50 years are 4 in 10 and within 100 years, 7 in 10. In other words, in the next 100 years, there is a 7-out-of-10 chance that we are going to have a nuclear holocaust. And within 500 years, which is about the same time it is now from the time Christopher Columbus discovered this continent, the odds of escaping a nuclear conflagration are a tiny 1 in 200. There is a 199-out-of-200 chance that we will have nuclear war in that period of time.

So what do we do? There are only two things that we can do. One is, we can take a technological approach and say we are going to build a defense system that makes nuclear weapons obsolete and we will be safe from that standpoint. I shall talk about that in just a moment.

The other one, the one that Einstein, by implication, was recommending, is that we make a giant leap forward in our mentality and the way we think about nuclear war. They are both immeasurably difficult, whether you are talking about a technological breakthrough or a giant leap forward in our thinking about our relationships with other nations. The main thing we must not do is allow false promises to lure us into a belief that there is some kind of salvation awaiting us that will save us. We have to face the awful truth.

Mr. President, I am not suggesting that we live white-knuckled all day every day in anticipation of this or keep our children nervous and upset constantly about the threat. And, incidentally, we are not. The peace movement which was so strong 3 years ago is on the back burner. Gorbachev's offer the other day of a 5-month moratorium, as Mary McGrory said in her column this morning, was met in Europe, where most of these activities always begin, by a giant yawn.

First, we must recognize that nuclear weapons will never be uninvented.

As the scientists who created the first bomb wrote 2 months before Hiroshima, "The fundamental facts of nuclear power are common knowledge."

Mr. President, there is no technological way to eliminate the weapons and there is no technological way to eliminate the nuclear threat. There is never going to be a technological quick fix. Any technological breakthrough could save us. I am not saying it does not exist, that we may not find it, but I am telling you that it is not an ultimate solution, that any solution along those lines will ultimately be available to our enemies and other countries. So to preach that kind of pious nonsense exploits and deceives the deepest yearnings of mankind for peace.

Star wars is going to be a blind alley. I am absolutely certain that star wars will not only bankrupt this country, but that it will not work.

Incidentally, if this were just a layman standing on the floor of the U.S. Senate saying that, that would be one thing, but when 50 of 100 physicists at the University of Illinois, perhaps second only to MIT in the field, say that this is absolute folly, then I am in pretty good company.

Nobody suggests that star wars is 100 percent perfect. Nobody suggests that it is going to be effective against certain submarine missiles or bombers. So I want to quote the scientists, who spoke wisely in June of 1945, again, when they said:

> In the past, science has often been able to provide new methods of protection against new weapons of aggression it made possible, but it cannot promise such efficient protection against the destructive use of nuclear power. This protection can only come from the political organization of the world * * *. In no other type of warfare does the advantage lie so heavily with the aggressor. He can place his "infernal machines" in advance in all our major cities and explode them simultaneously, thus destroying a major part of our industry and a large part of our population.

That is taken from a report by the Franck committee to the Secretary of War on June 11, 1945.

This does not mean we should not spend a prudent amount of money for basic research on ballistic missile defense, but it does not make any sense to spend billions and maybe a trillion dollars when we know it is not going to work. I believe the sound approach is to make certain we have a credible deterrent and to work seriously and hard at reaching good arms control agreements and to meet the Soviets halfway in trying to improve our relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 15 minutes have expired.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I shall wrap this up. I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to proceed for 2 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, the measure of success for arms control is not whether it solves all of our problems or meets the gigantic criteria set by one side or the other.

The test of a good arms control agreement is would we be better off with it than we would be without it. Now, you can talk about deep cuts, which this administration has done, and I applaud that, but to say it has to be deep cuts according to our proposals at the START talks and nothing else will do is the height of folly. We have concerns about Soviet treaty compliance; everybody recognizes that, and that means we must put greater emphasis on verifiability but it does not mean that we ought to give up arms control treaties and arms control negotiations altogether.

So let us remember that the Soviets have done some things to come into compliance also, and let us not also forget that there is always room for improvements in relations. It has not been that long ago since Britain and France were at war with each other. It has not been that long ago that the United States and Japan, the two biggest trading partners in the world, were at war with each other. It has not been that long ago since China and Russia, the two greatest Communist powers in the world, were in active armed conflict and now they are living rather peaceably even though they have entirely different kinds of systems.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a quote by George Washington, saying that any nation which indulges toward another an habitual hatred or an habitual fondness is in some degree a slave, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the quotation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> Nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations * * * should be excluded; and that in place of them, just and amicable feelings towards all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges toward another an habitual hatred, or an habitual fondness, is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or a slave to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another, disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury.
> To lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. Hence, frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The Nation, prompted by ill will and resentment, sometimes impels to war the government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The Government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times, it makes the animosity of a nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty of nations, has been the victim.

THE LESSONS OF HIROSHIMA

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, 40 years ago today, the world entered the nuclear age in a blinding flash of light as the Japanese city of Hiroshima was obliterated; 3 days later, a second holocaust was visited upon the inhabitants of Nagasaki. Shortly thereafter, the Japanese surrendered.

Forty years later, five nations have massive nuclear arsenals totaling more than 50,000 weapons. Other nations may have nuclear weapons or be on the verge. The United States alone has about 11,000 nuclear warheads in its strategic arsenal—each one of them capable of causing more devastation by far than was brought about in Hiroshima and Nagasaki. A single B-52 carries more nuclear explosive force than all of the bombs dropped by the allies in World War II. A single Trident submarine carries about 200 warheads—each one capable of obliterating a major city and most of those who dwell in it.

Whether it is a divine providence or some wisdom of our own, or both, which has saved us from ultimate folly, the world should be grateful almost beyond imagining that the world has been spared more nuclear holocausts in the past four decades.

The fact we have been spared from the use of nuclear weapons in war gives us cause for profound relief, but it does not give us cause for us to conclude that the risk we face is anything less than terrible. We would be well advised to use this day to resolve that all of us—regardless of political outlook—will do all that we can to bring about genuine curbs on the arms race, that we will do our utmost to reduce our nuclear arsenals, and that we will mean it when we say we will try to remove nuclear weapons from the face of the Earth. These are goals which must transcend political differences.

We should bear in mind the words of one of the most distinguished military leaders of this century, General of the Army Douglas MacArthur, who reminded us in 1961:

> Global war has become a Frankenstein's monster, threatening to destroy both sides. . . . It contains now only the germs of a double suicide.

Recently, several of the distinguished scientists who developed the bombs which devastated Hiroshima and Nagasaki appeared in the Senate to tell of their experiences and to reflect upon the present dangers. They were unanimous in their view that we must move urgently to place better controls on nuclear weapons. These men were direct witnesses to the effects of nuclear weapons. We should listen to them and reject the misbegotten notions of those who would willingly risk the future of mankind on the theory that somehow one side or the other can prevail in a nuclear conflict.

As we face the task of bringing about arms control, we can take no comfort in the fact that relations with our principal adversary, the Soviet Union, remain so difficult. We look for hopeful signs, but we must be realistic in recognizing that we have a great distance to go in restoring a relationship in which we can forge solid arms control agreements which protect our interests, but move us further back from the brink of the nuclear abyss.

Despite the difficulties, we can succeed. Both the United States and the Soviet Union must recognize their self-interest. Both must know that it is a better course to control arms and remove the threat of mutual self-annihilation.

I hope that we can act in a bipartisan fashion to help the President move the negotiations in Geneva beyond the present stalemate so that solid agreements can be reached on space weapons, strategic offensive weapons, and intermediate-range nuclear weapons in Europe.

The President and the Senate should move to ratify the two yet-unratified testing treaties—the Threshold Test Ban Treaty of 1974 and Peaceful Nuclear Explosions Treaty of 1976. We should reopen negotiations on a comprehensive ban on nuclear explosions. We must find ways to bolster the Non-Proliferation Treaty of 1978 to give the 124 non-nuclear-weapons states party to that pact reason to continue to forswear nuclear weapons. Success in these endeavors will be difficult, but success will occur if we have the resolve.

Arms control agreements will not end the arms race. Nonetheless, they can blunt—and even remove—its most dangerous aspects. Most importantly, arms control can keep us away from the brink. In time, if we succeed, the present peril may be a dim memory to our grandchildren and their children.

We need to recall Nagasaki and Hiroshima now to strengthen our resolve that nuclear war will never happen again. There is no greater inheritance we can offer those who will follow us.

THE SCIENCE OF WAR AND THE ART OF PEACE

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I rise to join the distinguished junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SIMON] to speak in observance of the 40th anniversary of one of the most somber and awe-inspiring events in human history. It is fitting and proper for us as Americans to commemorate that fateful event, for we indeed played the major role.

Ours is the greatest Nation on Earth, Mr. President, because we are an immigrant society founded upon, and bound together by, those ideals known by the word "democracy"; all other nations have sprung from a single dominant ethnic origin. Therefore, it is not surprising, I suppose, that among those of us in Congress old enough to have vivid memories of Hiroshima and Nagasaki we bring not only ambivalence in our feelings but different perspectives to our recollections. In yesterday's Washington Post the Enola Gay's commander, Col. Paul Tibbets, tells of meeting my old friend from my years in the House, Congressman JACK BROOKS of Texas, who expressed his gratitude that the colonel's fateful flight had brought an end to the war in the Pacific because he had been a marine, poised for the massive invasion which Japan's surrender forestalled. For my part, as a twice-wounded survivor of the war in Europe, I too rejoiced that it was finally over, even as I grieved over the loss of maternal relatives among the 113,000 killed outright in that first blast from a single bomb. Hiroshima was my mother's homeland. It is a small world, after all, and one which is fragile to the forces of nature and the ways inherent in the human condition.

World War II's destruction was enormous—including the profound loss of belief that civilization progresses over time and the achievements of science can only benefit mankind. That single war's legacy was the loss of 50 million lives in the period of 5½ years: 20 million Russians, 5 million Germans, 2 million Japanese, 1 million British and French, and some 300,000 Americans, not to mention the 1.3 million killed in the concurrent Chinese-Japanese war. Its conclusion gave birth to the present unsettling era of nuclear warfare capable of dwarfing even its own enormity. Physicists, indeed, had forged a two-edge sword.

Newspapers and magazines have devoted much attention to this 40th anniversary, especially to the circumstances whereby the United States introduced atomic weaponry into modern warfare with such shattering results. Some of the reportage has been most revealing in detailing the communications gap between scientists and political policymakers regarding the bomb and its deployment, the ethical concerns of its creators, and the moral cautions consistently voiced by Chief of Staff Gen. George C. Marshall versus the tactical arguments advanced by Chief Scientist Dr. J. Robert Oppenheimer. Perhaps the greatest irony of all, in the circumstances surrounding that Earth-shaking event, was how woefully below the mark the estimates of our Nation's finest scientific minds were, regarding the bomb's anticipated death toll; how incredulous Gen. Leslie Groves, commander of the Manhattan Project, was upon hearing the first reports of widespread radiation sickness and death.

In the decades since that day when Hiroshima was obliterated by a single bomb on the order of 0.01 megaton, the nuclear stockpile of the two superpowers—Russia and the United States—has mushroomed to more than 50,000 such weapons with a total yield of 13,000 megatons. So the nuclear physicists have invalidated the proposition that warfare is one extreme option in the arsenal of international diplomacy. That option is no longer available. Nuclear science and the uncertain logic of deterrence defense strategy have raised the art of peacemaking to a global imperative. At Hiroshima the science of war demonstrated war's ultimate futility.

The art of peacemaking, hailed so long ago in the sermon on the mount, has long been valued in our Nation's history. The concept of a national agency devoted to peace research and education originated shortly after the American Revolutionary War when a "Plan for a Peace Office" appeared in a popular almanac. George Washington himself endorsed the idea of a "proper peace establishment" within the Federal Government. In this 20th century more than 140 bills have been introduced in Congress providing for the establishment of a Federal agency which would conduct peace research and training. Last year, after more than 200 years of hibernation, the idea finally reached fruition.

As for me, it represented the culmination of a dream going back to my college days when the 98th Congress passed legislation to establish just such an agency by the creation of the U.S. Institute of Peace. As a freshman in college writing a term paper on the tendencies of our culture that glorify war, I had called for replacing "attitudes favorable to war with attitudes opposed to war" and my own battlefield experiences as an Army infantry officer reinforced these sentiments a few years later. Then, when I was first elected to the U.S. Congress 23 years ago I introduced a bill calling for the establishment of a U.S. Academy of Peace. At that time there were newspaper editorialists who admonished me to "quit dreaming dreams and get on with the business of realistic legislation," a sentiment which was shared by some of my own political supporters and staff.

Nevertheless, I persisted and today I enjoy a feeling of gratification and expectation which comes from the near-realization of a dream, nurtured over a period of 48 years.

I say "near realization," Mr. President, because President Reagan, in seeming defiance of the statute, has yet to carry out this part of the legislation creating the U.S. Institute of Peace which he himself signed into law. The statutory deadline of April 20, 1985, for the President to submit to the Senate his nominations to the Peace Institute's Board of Directors, arrived more than 3 months ago—still no nominations. I devoutly hope it will not be necessary to take the President to court for a writ of mandamus ordering him to perform his duty under the law which he himself had approved by signing it. If and when he makes his appointments, I also hope and pray that the quality of his appointees will justify the undue delay.

Looking to the future, I can see an enormous influence on the preservation of world order and peace, emanating from the Institute's programs and catalytic activities, if those appointed to carry out its mission approach their assignment with dedication, imagination, and vigor. I urge the President to give us a slate of people capable of this most vital undertaking. He is well into his second term: the period when, it is said, he plans to make his mark in history as a major contributor to world peace. The Institute, therefore, represents an opportunity for him to make such a mark by appointing eminent, creative peacemakers who can fashion and build upon the congressional blueprint we have offered.

Mr. President, because Hiroshima was my mother's home, the event triggered by the Enola Gay's flight 40 years ago was a traumatic one for me personally, even as it was traumatic for the world at large for what it foretold. While the quest of science is an endless one, the aspirations for peace are eternal. We must never lose faith in human reason and hence we must always strive for peace, even in ways which at times may appear foolish to others, for the lesson of Hiroshima is the ultimate absurdity of war itself.

THE 40th ANNIVERSARY OF HIROSHIMA

Mr. KENNEDY. On August 6, 1945 the world witnessed the detonation of the first atomic bomb over Hiroshima. As we prepare to commemorate the 40th anniversary of that fateful day, we solemnly recall the awful power of destruction that was unleashed in the world and renew our pledge—to ourselves and to future generations—that never again should such a terrible force be used.

Tragically, the 40 years since Hiroshima speak more of our failure than our success in learning the lessons of that day. We have accumulated 50,000 nuclear weapons on this planet in those four decades, most of them far more dangerous and destructive than the first atomic bombs. The arms race is gaining more momentum even though the stockpiles of the Soviet Union and the United States can already destroy the world many times over. In a world that contemplates overkill and megadeath, people ask when the United States and the Soviet Union will learn that enough is enough. When will we, the human family, begin to think in new ways and to act with bold measures so that our descendants will have us to thank rather than to condemn?

We have had some success in placing limits on nuclear competition. The Limited Test Ban Treaty of 1963 put an end to atmospheric testing. The Nonproliferation Treaty of 1968 helped restrict the spread of arms to other countries. The ABM Treaty halted a particularly dangerous and destabilizing arms race in defensive weapons and provided a basis for future reductions. Finally SALT II, although limited and never ratified, put a partial ceiling on the open-ended arms spiral.

But the arms race does continue and the risk of nuclear confrontation remains great. Even our existing arms control regimes are in danger undermined by both sides.

The bombings of Hiroshima and Nagasaki were the first, and so far, the last use of nuclear weapons. If we are to prevent a nuclear catastrophe in the future, we must redouble our efforts not simply to prevent nuclear war, but to prevent all war, because in a nuclear age we cannot rest on the hope that any war can be confined and controlled.

Let us make August 6 and 8 days of remembrance and peace. We mourn the tens of thousands dead and the afflicted survivors. We honor both cities as symbols of conscience and peace. However, it is not our words but our actions that will demonstrate our commitment to peace and the long road toward arms reduction and back from the nuclear brink.

In recent days, we have heard proposals from both sides concerning nuclear testing. Let us truly honor the memory of Hiroshima by making August 6 the date on which the United States and U.S.S.R. redouble their efforts for nuclear arms control, so that future generations will remember that date as a day not only of destruction, but also of hope and life.

The imagination and creativity that built the bomb can be harnessed to ensure that it never again be used. If we fail, there may be no one left to apportion the blame.

THE LESSONS OF HIROSHIMA

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, on August 6, 1985, we will remember that 40 years ago the first atom bomb was exploded over the city of Hiroshima in Japan. The result revolutionized not only warfare but the entire world—the nuclear age had begun. The first immediate effect was, of course, the death and injury of many thousands of people who lived in Hiroshima. The city itself was destroyed.

About a month after the bomb was dropped, I walked through the atomic ashes of Hiroshima and, of course, can never forget that experience. The entire city was leveled. As I approached the edges of the city, the first evidence of the bombing was apparent. Window panes were out, doors blown off the hinges and as one continued toward the center of the city, the damage got progressively worse; walls caved in, roofs collapsed. And finally, near the epicenter, near the point of greatest impact of the bomb, everything was totally destroyed. And what had been a populous urban center was as flat as a Kansas wheat field.

There were grim reminders of what life had been like at the moment the bomb was exploded. A tricycle sitting in the middle of the street, its wheels twisted by pressure and by heat, recalled that some child had been riding that tricycle at the moment the bomb was detonated. And a lump of molten glass, which upon examination proved to be three or four tumblers fused together by the intense heat of a fireball, was a reminder that a nuclear bomb—a triple threat combination of heat and explosive force and radiation—is a scourge for the human race.

It seems to me that the way to observe this anniversary is not to debate the act itself but rather to try to learn the lessons of Hiroshima. Certainly, the first lesson is that it should never happen again in any city. Hiroshima and Nagasaki should stand out in human history as the only cities where in all of time, in all of history, a nuclear attack took place. If we learn this lesson and apply it to our relationships today with the Soviet Union and with the rest of the world, and if all mankind will join with us in trying to apply the lessons of Hiroshima to the future, then in fact we will be able to stop the arms race. We will be able to reduce the chance that nuclear weapons will ever again be used on any population in any part of the world. We will be able to devote some of the resources that are now being squandered on armaments to improving the quality of life for all the people of the world.

That is the lesson of Hiroshima and that should be the monument of Hiroshima.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

THE PINCUS REPORT: NUCLEAR DETERRENCE WORKS BETTER WITH EACH PASSING YEAR

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, Walter Pincus completed a series of articles in the Washington Post in July on the remarkable revolution in the attitude of our Government toward nuclear weapons that has occurred in the 40 years since the dawn of the nuclear age at Hiroshima. The Pincus report examined a great deal of material that had been classified for many years. His articles shattered the secrecy that had enveloped our country's nuclear policy since nuclear weapons transformed the military policy of the superpowers. All careful readers of that report must have been shocked to be reminded of the initial attitude toward nuclear weapons during the first 10 to 20 years of the atomic age and warmly encouraged by the progress toward a far more cautious policy since that time.

The Pincus report begins with a description of the passionate rush to explode that first little, fat nuclear bomb over Hiroshima. Then came the rapid-fire race to prepare and drop another nuclear bomb over Nagasaki. Vice Adm. Frederick Ashworth, who was in charge of the second bomb on the raid, said, "This was the shortest time between development and operational use of any weapon in ordnance history." For the years that immediately followed—first in Korea and later in Vietnam—our Presidents were ready and willing to use the bomb.

President Eisenhower only decided against using the bomb in the Korean war for two reasons: First, the nuclear weapons seemed to be of little value against Chinese and North Korean troops that were scattered and well entrenched. Second, the President was concerned about a nuclear retaliation from the Soviet Union. But that cavalier attitude toward the use of nuclear weapons by the United States began to fade with the Cuban missile crisis of October 1962. That crisis showed American leadership how a military confrontation between the superpowers can lead with breathtaking swiftness to the brink of nuclear war.

The U-2 plane, at that time America's prime window on enemy nuclear weapons activity, provided photos on October 16, 1962, that showed the Soviet nuclear missile build up in Cuba. Then, wham bam this country raced toward a nuclear strike. That very day President Kennedy called a meeting of his top national security advisers. They discussed in detail a nuclear strike against the Soviet missiles in Cuba. The strike was set for October 20, 96 hours later. During that 96-hour span, the Kennedy administration decided to offer the Soviet Union a secret deal. The secrecy was critical.

The deal was this: We would withdraw our missiles from Turkey. Those American missiles could totally and instantly devastate many Russian cities against any defense. In return for U.S. withdrawal of missiles from Turkey, the Soviets would take their missiles out of Cuba. It worked. But for a week or so the world was literally on the brink of nuclear war. If the Soviets had not agreed to withdraw their missiles, we certainly would have struck with nuclear weapons against the Soviet nuclear missiles in Cuba. If one or two of those Soviet missiles in Cuba had survived, very possibly the Soviets would have fired the surviving missile to obliterate Washington or New York or both. Or the Soviets might have made a nuclear attack on U.S. missiles in Turkey. Such an attack would probably have triggered a general European war. Could this same kind of strategy that avoided a nuclear war in 1962 work again? Probably not. The secrecy of 1962 would be harder to achieve today. And without secrecy the deal would have collapsed. Advance notice of the intended U.S. withdrawal of missiles from Turkey would have been regarded as a sellout of our European allies, a fatal sign of weakness. But both superpowers are far more cautious today.

The progress toward caution and away from nuclear brinksmanship becomes apparent in another incident related by Pincus. In 1973, as the Israelis were on the verge of winning their war with Egypt, the Soviets moved nuclear weapons by ship toward Egypt. The threat to the very existence of Israel was obvious. The United States reacted by going on a full nuclear alert. That nuclear alert convinced the Russians that in spite of the domestic distractions in the United States with the Watergate crisis at its peak, the United States was ready, willing and able to respond in kind to a Soviet nuclear attack. But both President Nixon and his Secretary of Defense James Schlesinger, told Pincus that in their judgment in this later incident the superpowers were never close to nuclear war.

Pincus stresses the caution consistently exercised by the Soviets not only in the Egypt-Israeli incident but throughout their nearly 70-year history and particularly in the last 40 years, during the nuclear age. Far and away the most powerful element pushing the superpowers toward peace is the colossal growth in power of the superpowers' deterrent. As late as 1960 the United States had a roughly 10 to 1 edge in the strategic nuclear warheads over the Soviet Union. The count was 6,500 to 600. Today the U.S. advantage has practically vanished. It is 10,800 to 9,600. Pincus reports that most experts, including former National Security Director Bundy, and former Defense Secretaries McNamara and Schlesinger find that difference meaningless. In fact, McNamara calls the size of the deterrents ridiculously excessive. But it seems to have convinced most of the experts that a nuclear war will not start with a superpower attack.

How would it start? Schlesinger and Nixon see a nuclear war, if it does start, starting with a third country. This Senator shares that judgment. This is precisely why the weakening of the United States antiproliferation policies in the proposed nuclear transfer agreement with the People's Republic of China is such a dangerous mistake.

With that gloomy exception, let us be grateful for our blessings. The happy fact is that the likelihood of a superpower nuclear was has diminished. Why? Not because we have developed any mutual and reciprocated affection for our great adversary, not because of growing trust in the world. We do not love our enemy. Our enemy certainly does not love us. Why then has peace advanced? We keep the peace out of a deep, all-encompassing fear. We do not want to die. We want to live. The leaders in the other superpower feel exactly the same way. Americans and the Soviets know that a superpower war means that we are dead. We are gone forever. We are finished. We are through, kaput. At last we get the message. Capital punishment is a grim and terrible deterrent. Obviously it does not work very well with criminals. But for world leaders it has worked for 40 years. It has done more than that. As the Pincus report details so clearly, that message of deterrence is working better with each passing year. Not cooperation, not trust, not love, but fear has brought peace.

MYTH OF THE DAY: THAT PRAYER HAS NO PLACE IN GOVERNMENT—IF SO, WHY THE CHAPLAIN?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the myth of the day today is that any government that mixes prayer every single day with the sessions of its congress or parliament heads for big trouble. Well, Mr. President, for some 200 years the U.S. Senate, as well as the House of Representatives, has opened every session with a prayer. We did this morning. We will tomorrow morning. And where is the trouble? This U.S. Senate is a living denial of the myth that has cut American schools off from prayer on the theory that somehow prayer will demean, insult, offend, or shame those who hear the prayer. What absolute, total nonsense! Chaplain Halvorson and the remarkable chaplains who have preceded him have given this body inspiring spiritual counsel.

I ask my colleagues to listen carefully to these daily prayers. What do they tell us? They tell us to be kind and gentle, to care for the poor, to comfort the suffering, to forget about ourselves. They challenge us to meet three of the hardest tasks in the world: First, to return love for hate; second, to include the excluded and, third, to say: "I was wrong." Again and again the chaplain gives a spiritual dimension to an economic or even a military problem. Does he avoid the political problems of the day, so that he can keep religion free of politics? Never. He steps right in swinging with his spiritual counsel. It is true that few Members of the Senate are physically in this body to hear the chaplain's prayer every day. But that daily prayer is carried to every office in the Senate by radio. It is printed as the very first statement of any kind in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in every issue, every day. That means 27,000 copies of the daily prayer are distributed by the Government all over the country in libraries and, yes, in schools, too.

Now, Mr. President, there are two reasons why this regular daily prayer for 200 years flatly rebuts the myth that prayer has no place in government. First, this Senator in a long lifetime has yet to hear or read the prayer—Protestant, Catholic, Jewish, Mohammedan, Russian Orthodox, or other—in or out of the Senate that could cause any significant offense to any person. Second, the daily prayers in the Senate constitute a true highlight of our daily proceedings. They provide a spiritual dimension that we need. They appeal to our best instincts of forgiveness, love, tolerance. We are not only better human beings because of these prayers we hear every day, at the very seat of Government, we are better Senators. And we have a better country.

THE POSSIBILITY OF POL POT REGAINING POWER IN CAMBODIA

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, a frightening political struggle is being waged in Cambodia today.

According to the New York Times of July 17, the Khmer Rouge has publicly stated for the first time that it is prepared to share power with the current Vietnamese-controlled government.

Pol Pot was mentioned in their announcement as the man best able to share leadership in Cambodia.

Nearly 2 million innocent Cambodians died under Pol Pot's savage regime, before he was overthrown in 1979 by the Vietnamese.

And now, 6 years later, the Khmer Rouge has announed a plan for Cambodia that would make it "economically capitalistic and diplomatically neutral."

A plan they think would be best realized if Pol Pot were in the position to help guide Cambodia's future.

Currently, the Heng Samrin puppet government is in power in Cambodia, but there is a coalition which has formed in opposition to this rule.

The primary coalition member is the Khmer Rouge—other members are Son Sann, of the Khmer People's National Liberation Front, and Prince Norodom Sihanouk of the Sihanoukist National Army.

But now people in and out of Cambodia worry that Pol Pot would not be satisfied with any new power, and would attempt to seize complete control of the government.

They also fear that the slaughter—the genocide—committed against millions of Cambodians under Pol Pot's past reign, could occur again.

It could happen again, Mr. President, if this vicious man is allowed to rule.

Pol Pot's tenure may have been short, but it was the most ruthless attempt to wipe out a culture since the Holocaust.

He should never be permitted another tenure—another chance to subject Cambodians to his atrocities.

The people in Cambodia have suffered under Pol Pot and the Khmer Rouge, they have suffered under the Vietnamese—they should not have to endure Pol Pot's madness again.

In the past, it has been difficult to get accurate and current news of Cambodia.

The millions killed before were almost unnoticed by our press and public.

So long as we are able to receive news that alerts us to the possibility of another genocide—the Khmer Rouge and Pol Pot wishing to regain power, for example—then we must not turn our backs to it.

Now that we have received such news we must take effective action.

We must ratify the Genocide Treaty.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER].

THE FARM BILL

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I thank my friend from Wisconsin.

The Agriculture Committee meeting this morning has been canceled due to the two conferences meeting. Pending is a key vote on holding target prices steady for the 4 years of the bill. We had a meeting canceled yesterday afternoon when that vote was pending. We hope we can meet this afternoon. The majority leader has said that despite any action or inaction by the Senate Agriculture Committee, he would have a farm bill up before the recess, but the majority leader very wisely instead has opted for a discussion this afternoon of farm-related issues.

I thank my friend from Wisconsin for yielding me this time.

MILITARY PERSONNEL AND VETERANS GROUP LIFE INSURANCE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I am pleased that the Veterans Committee and the Senate have accepted my amendment dealing with Servicemen's and Veterans' Group Life Insurance as part of S. 876 the Veterans' Administration Health Care Programs Improvement Act.

Mr. President, this amendment, which has now passed the Senate three times, increases the amount of optional life insurance available to military personnel and veterans from the present cap of $35,000 to $50,000.

There is a great need for increasing the amount of optional insurance for our military personnel. The current cap of $35,000 is far too low for a typical military family and it is far less than the more generous insurance programs we have provided for Federal employees, congressional employees, and Members of Congress. Federal employee insurance is supported in part by Government contributions. The Military and Veteran Insurance Program addressed in this amendment is entirely self-supporting.

Federal employees and Members of Congress can now sign up for basic life insurance based on the dollar amount of their annual salary, plus an additional $10,000 in supplementary insurance plus an option of up to five times the amount of their annual salary. Thus someone in Federal service making, say $20,000 a year, could sign up for a total of $130,000 in life insurance. A military member making $20,000 a year is currently limited to $35,000.

This discriminatory system of optional life insurance mistreats our military personnel and is inequitable from every perspective. A military family with several dependents may need far more than $35,000 in insurance if college costs, mortgages and other long-term obligations are to be met for the survivors. And it is difficult if not impossible for many military families to get insurance that covers war risks through private insurance firms.

The average American family now has about $56,000 in life insurance coverage. My amendment brings our military families and our veterans nearly up to this national average.

Mr. President, this amendment had the support of the Secretary of Defense, the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Manpower, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Service Secretaries and the heads of the National Guard and Reserve components.

This is a self-supporting program. It has no budgetary impact. It does not cost the taxpayers anything unless we become engaged in a general war involving the deaths of thousands of our soldiers which would require the payment of death benefits to their families.

Payments to this program—the premiums paid by the service personnel, pay for insurance payments required during peacetime. There has been no Government cost to this program since 1974 when the last Vietnam related payments were made. Even when U.S. personnel have sustained several hundred casualties in recent years such as in Lebanon with our marines or during the Grenada invasion, the insurance program has been able to make all payments without recourse to Federal support.

If we were to become involved in a general war with thousands of casualties, as during Vietnam, then there would be a Federal cost. In that unlikely event, I think it is only fair and just and patriotic that our Government make such benefits available to the families who sacrificed so much for our country.

During the Vietnam war, the United States was required to pay out death benefits of $507 million to the families of those who died fighting for us. The United States spent over $150 billion on that war. If there was 1 penny that deserved to be spent on that war in Vietnam, it was for insurance for our military families—to help those families of soldiers who did not come home.

Mr. President, I wish to recognize and applaud the contribution to this effort made by Congressman SONNY MONTGOMERY, the chairman of the House Veterans' Committee. His bill, H.R. 1709, is the model for this amendment and his support for our men and women in uniform is unmatched in the Congress.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR KERRY

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KERRY] is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

TIME IS RUNNING OUT IN THE PHILIPPINES

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, over the past several months, it has become increasingly clear that we face a rapidly deteriorating situation in the Philippines.

The Communist New People's Army is growing at an alarmingly rapid rate. It is generally now accepted that, barring a reversal of current trends, the NPA could be in a position to challenge the Armed Forces of the Philippines within as little as 3 years.

Mr. President, the Congress has acknowledged, in the recently passed conference report on the fiscal year 1986 foreign assistance authorization, that the only way the United States can help avert such an eventuality is to convince the Philippine Government that it must make significant political and military reforms.

Last May, the Senate approved overwhelmingly a bipartisan resolution on the Philippines that called for the United States to "encourage the revitalization of democracy in the Philippines" and warned the Philippine Government that Congress intends to grant future aid to the Marcos regime only if progress has been made in human rights and the democratization process has been made in human rights and the democratization process. This resolution was incorporated in the foreign assistance bill recently approved by both bodies of the Congress.

Passage of this amendment represents a major step toward a constructive congressional role in supporting the full restoration of democracy in the Philippines. In the coming months, we need to consider carefully how Congress can best advance this aim.

Mr. President, I decided to visit the Philippines last April in order to develop a better basis for determining what Congress could do to support the democratization process, improvement in human rights, and reform in the military. During a 6-day trip to the Philippines, from April 6 to 11, I visited the U.S. naval facility at Subic Bay and met with U.S. Embassy officials, high officials of the Philippine Government, and a wide range of opposition figures, including politicians, academicians, human rights groups, and representatives of the church.

I prepared a report on my visit which I hope will help clarify for Members the choices we confront in the Philippines. Today, I should like to discuss briefly some of the findings and conclusions of that report, which I will ask to have printed in the RECORD.

This trip impressed upon me the moral and political stake of the United States in encouraging the revitalization of democratic institutions in the Philippines. I was struck by the commitment that hundreds of thousands of Filipinos have made to actively defending the fairness of the electoral process in their country. These people have no guns; they have no army. They cannot, and do not desire to, seize power through violence. Yet, these people who have been active in the movement for free and fair elections are freedom fighters in the truest sense of that term. And I believe that we have a moral obligation to support them.

Mr. President, the briefings I received on the NPA insurgency left no doubt in my mind that, as of now, the NPA is winning the political contest in the Philippines. According to the estimate given to me by one U.S. military official, out of a total population of 54 million, only 12 million, or a little over 20 percent, staunchly oppose the NPA, while another 12 million are susceptible to NPA influence. The remaining 30 million people are considered to be indifferent to the struggle. This means that some 78 percent of the population of the Philippines does not support the Marcos regime—a very bad omen for a government fighting a homegrown insurgency.

Why are a majority of the population believed to be either sympathetic to the NPA or indifferent? I was told that the reasons include a decline in Government services; the Government's loss of credibility; and the increasing violence directed against civilians by the armed forces. The key to reversing these trends, according to Embassy officials, is to restore the Government's legitimacy and to ensure that the army is no longer perceived by the population as being the enemy.

The most urgent need of all is an end to the arbitrary arrest, torture, and killing of civilians—activities which have so alienated the civilian population in areas of NPA activity that they have been driven willingly into the arms of the NPA. Unless the abusive behavior and wanton killing of civilians by Government security forces are curbed, there is every reason to believe that the NPA will continue to grow rapidly over the next 2 or 3 years.

On the day I left the Philippines, an Italian missionary, Father Tullio Favili, was savagely murdered in Cotabato by men who were allegedly part of an integrated civilian home defense force unit in that village. This murder has focused increasing attention in the Philippines on a serious problem which has aroused fear and anger among Catholic and Protestant clergy and laity alike. This, and similar incidents, can only serve to radicalize priests and nuns in a country which is overwhelmingly Catholic in its religious makeup.

The problem of curbing abuses against civilians is clearly related to the broader issue of military reform. The immediate obstacle to progress on this issue is the continued retention of most Filipino generals beyond their retirement age—generals, who for the most part are not professional military men, but cronies of President Marcos or Gen. Fabian Ver, who was chief of staff of the armed forces until he was indicted in the Aquino assassination. It is clear that there will not be any changes in policy regarding salvaging and other abuses of civilians unless and until the power of Ver and his allies in the military is broken.

Unfortunately, President Marcos has continued to indicate his support for General Ver. He has pledged to bring Ver back as chief of staff if he is found not guilty in the Aquino assassination. He appears to have tried to influence the trial of General Ver as well, by publicly casting doubt on prosecution witnesses. Most Americans and Filipinos with whom I talked expect Ver to be acquitted and to be reinstated by Marcos. Even though Ambassador Bosworth and other U.S. officials have made it clear that the United States feels strongly that Ver should not be reinstated, such representations appear to have made little impression on Marcos up to this moment.

Mr. President, I went to the Philippines with the belief that it was vital for Congress and the executive branch to throw the full weight of the United States behind genuinely free and fair elections in the Philippines. I returned from this trip even more convinced that free elections are an essential element in any plan to save the Philippines. Unless the people can bring new leadership into power through the ballot box, there is no chance for Government to regain a measure of popular support and credibility. Ballots which are perceived as meaningful may help turn the situation around; bullets alone will certainly fail.

Last year, President Marcos held parliamentary elections through which he hoped to legitimize his regime by allowing the opposition to participate but by guaranteeing that his party won a majority of seats. Those elections demonstrated not only how strongly attached the Filipino people are to free elections but how deep is the dissatisfaction with the present government. In a relatively short time, the National Citizen's Movement for Free Elections—Namfrel—a private volunteer poll-watching organization, was able to mobilize 150,000 volunteers to observe the polling in approximately 40 percent of the nation's precincts. In many races, that presence made the difference between a fraudulent election and a fair one, with the result that many more opposition candidates were elected than anticipated.

The combination of Namfrel's success and a high voter turnout gave the opposition an unexpectedly large number of seats—one-third of the 180 at stake. It raised the hopes of the democratic opposition that elections could once more reflect popular will—if safeguards of fairness are built into the process.

Democratic opposition figures with whom I met are still emerging from the long night of authoritarian rule, during which they were unable to participate in politics in any meaningful way. But they are counting heavily on the United States to pressure the Marcos regime to agree to specific guarantees of free and fair elections.

The elections for provincial and local offices now scheduled for May 1986 and the Presidential election scheduled for May 1987 are critical to the restoration of credible government in the Philippines. Unless the people are convinced that the government represents their free choice, the possibility for saving democracy will be very slim indeed.

One of the hopes for a free and fair electoral process is Namfrel's role. I learned from Namfrel officials that they intend to target all of the approximately 100,000 voting centers in the country in the elections for provincial and local offices scheduled for next May. That would give the democratic opposition a much better chance for establishing a local political base in preparation for the 1987 Presidential election.

But President Marcos has refused to allow Namfrel's monitoring of the vote counting in the 1986 local elections or the 1987 Presidential elections, charging that it is an opposition organization. There have been disturbing reports that he is planning to create an alternative poll-watching organization that would be ostensibly independent but could actually be manipulated by the government to ensure the desired results.

The accreditation of Namfrel is one of the issues on which the United States must take a firm stand with regard to President Marcos in the next few months. But the Commission on Elections, which carries out the counting of votes from precinct to national level, must also be independent and impartial to safeguard against fraud.

Since the May 1984 elections, President Marcos has made no move toward reform of Comelec. Instead, he has signaled his intention of maintaining tight political control over the electoral process, in defiance of the sense of Congress resolution. Just 5 days after the passage of that resolution, Marcos named Victor Savellano, a member of his own KBL political party, to replace the retiring chairman of Comelec. The new chairman was so lacking in impartiality that he publicly declared his loyalty to President Marcos upon being named to the post.

One further infringement of political freedoms merits out attention. Although martial law was officially ended in 1981, the Marcos regime retains the power to detain political opponents without trial for indefinite periods, which it has used to suppress the opposition, especially outside the Metro Manila area. President Marcos has routinely signed preventive detention actions and given them to the military to arrest and detain individuals who could not be convicted of a crime. In recent months, the PDA has been used to arrest a number of human rights lawyers and activists, suggesting that the Marcos regime is determined to prevent targets of arbitrary arrest any access to legal assistance. This substitution of arbitrary power of arrest for the rule of law has set the regime against the legal community as well as the Catholic Church in the Philippines.

Even greater urgency now attaches to these issues of free and fair elections because of the possibility of a sudden election for the Presidency at any time during the next 2 years. Under legislation passed by the Parliament last year, the Speaker of the Parliament would automatically succeed President Marcos upon his death, whereupon a new election for President would be held within 45 to 60 days. Since last November, when Marcos became seriously ill, this provision has taken on new significance. Although the President's health now appears to have improved, the democratic opposition is preparing for the possibility of such a sudden election.

Mr. President, the situation in the Philippines obviously poses a painful dilemma for the United States. The administration, which was content to demonstrate its unequivocal support for President Marcos before the Aquino assassination, but is now trying to encourage necessary political, economic, and military reforms.

However, the fact is that the Philippine Government has not made a single positive move toward genuinely free and fair elections, or toward protection of basic human rights or curbing the activities of "death squads" during the past year.

On the contrary, there has been retrogression on each of these fronts, suggesting that President Marcos has concluded that he has a free hand to strengthen his grip on power: Marcos' interference in the Ver trial and his vow to restore Ver to his former position as chief of staff; his decertification of Namfrel and naming of a KBL member as chairman of Comelec; the increased numbers of extrajudicial killings, whose victims have included Catholic and Protestant clergymen as well as human rights lawyers and activists; and finally the stepped up arrests of human rights lawyers by the use of preventive detention actions; are examples of this strategy.

The Congress has now put the Marcos regime on notice that it cannot continue to provide economic and security assistance to his regime in the absence of significant reforms. If the situation does not improve in the coming months, we should seriously consider withholding most of the proposed military and economic support fund assistance to Marcos until a number of political and military reforms have been carried out.

Mr. President, some policymakers may fear that the use of security assistance as leverage on Marcos would expose the United States to the charge of violating the 1983 bases agreement with the Philippines. It has been argued that Marcos has come to expect "rent" for the U.S. use of bases in the Philippines, and that threatening to withhold aid could precipitate some drastic steps by President Marcos that would endanger U.S. access to Subic Bay and Clark.

We should be clear on what the 1983 bases agreement does and does not obligate us to do. U.S. negotiators never agreed to the Marcos regime's demands that U.S. security assistance be considered as "rent" for the bases. Nor could the executive branch commit the Congress to provide any amount of foreign assistance in advance. The President promised only to make his "best effort" to obtain $900 million in security assistance from Congress over 5 years, and the use of the bases is not legally contingent on any specific level of security assistance.

Whatever risks may exist to our use of military bases in the Philippines in imposing conditions on future military and economic assistance should not outweigh the risk that the Communist NPA will take power in the next few years in the absence of swift, far-reaching political and military reforms. Moreover, the policy Congress is now on record as supporting clearly expresses the values that we stand for at home and abroad. It would give support to those "freedom fighters" who continue to work for a democratic alternative to the authoritarianism of the left and the right.

Finally, Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of my colleagues to an excellent editorial which appeared in the July 30, 1985, Boston Globe. As the editorial pointed out:

The Philippines today resemble the Nicaragua or Iran of 10 years ago. President Ferdinand Marcos has lost touch with his people, and his people are losing patience with him. Marcos's associates have accrued wealth through a corrupt system backed by a brutal incompetent military. Popular support for the Marxist New People's Army is growing. As economic crisis deepens and political crisis festers, it has become obvious that rapid reform is the only way to avert upheaval.

Yet, the editorial correctly points out that the Marcos regime is repeating the same mistakes of the Shah of Iran and the Dictator Somoza—"he assumes that because he is pro-American, he can count on U.S. support."

Because of the importance of Subic Bay Naval Base and Clark Air Force Base, the Marcos regime believes it can hold the United States hostage to its own domestic policies. But the Globe editorial had a reasonable recommendation for our policymakers in the executive branch. We should call Marcos's bluff. As the editorial suggested:

A conspicuous order to the Pentagon to update its plans for relocating the Philippines would send a signal to both Marcos and his critics that the United States has learned from past mistakes * * *.

Marcos expects the United States to lose its nerve because of its narrow interest in the bases. This is the moment to show him he is wrong. Philippine democracy, symbolizing values to the United States hopes to see thriving around the world, is too rare to be bartered for runways, drydocks, fuel tanks and barracks.

I believe that latter observation by the Boston Globe places the Philippines debate in its proper perspective.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my report and the Globe editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PHILIPPINE CRISIS AND UNITED STATES INTERESTS

(Report on a trip to the Philippines by Senator John F. Kerry)

INTRODUCTION

During my trip to the Philippines from April 6 to 11, I visited the U.S. naval facility at Subic Bay and met with U.S. Embassy officials, high officials of the Philippine government and a wide range of opposition figures.

Ambassador Steven Bosworth and his staff were generous with their time and provided helpful briefings, as did Gen. Teddy Allen, chief of JUSMAG. At Subic Bay I was briefed by the base commander, Rear Admiral Edwin Kohn and shown around the facility by his staff. I talked with President Marcos in private for more than two hours, and with Minister of Human Settlements and Mayor of Metro Manila Imelda Marcos twice for a total of six hours. I would be happy to brief my colleagues on the Committee on the details of those conversations in executive session. Minister of Defense Juan Ponce Enrile and Acting Chief of Staff Gen. Fidel Ramos also met jointly with me.

I had a very useful breakfast meeting with Jaime Cardinal Sin and met with potential opposition candidates Ramon Mitra, Agapito "Butz" Aquino, Senator Jovito Salonga, and Ambrosio Padilla. I also had conversations with members of the opposition "Convenor Group", Mrs. Corazon Aquino and Jaime Ongpin, and with former Supreme Court Justice Cecelia Munoz-Palma, who was authorized by another opposition group to seek common ground with the Convenors Group.

I had a series of meetings with a number of business leaders, opposition parliamentarians, human rights activists, labor leaders, academicians and officials of the citizens volunteer pollwatching organization, NAMFREL. Among the opposition figures who met with me was the last President of the Philippines before Marcos, Diosdado Macapagal.

In my meetings with American officials and Filipinos I was primarily concerned with their assessment of the present political situation, the insurgency and the prospects for a return to democratic institutions. The picture that emerged from these briefings and conversations, which I have summarized in this report, led me to press for Senate action linking future U.S. military and economic assistance to reasonable evidence of progress on the vital issues of free elections and basic human rights. While the situation in the Philippines is constantly changing, the facts which I brought back from this trip are still relevant to future Senate consideration of the issue.

Finally, I wish to add that in my opinion Ambassador Bosworth is doing an exceptional job in a very difficult post. It is apparent that he has an acute historical awareness and sensitivity so necessary to the management of this very complex relationship. Since he assumed his current post, I believe there has been a clear change in U.S. policy, with much more energy focused on the need for democratic reforms. As a result of my meetings with the Ambassador in Manila and subsequent discussions with him during his visit to Washington in early June, I am convinced that he has moved effectively to bring appropriate pressures on the Marcos government for change.

I. BACKGROUND: PHILIPPINE POLITICS AND ECONOMY

The Philippines is a society in which vast rural and ubran poverty is juxtaposed with the great wealth amassed by a small elite. Since the colonial period, the Philippine rural economy has been marked by inequitable landholding in the rice, sugar and coconut sectors. The misery of the poor and landless peasants has been the root cause of agrarian unrest for decades. Efforts at land reform during the 1950's and 1960's were inadequate and their implementation was blocked by powerful interests which dominated the legislature. As a result, the majority of the Philippine people have suffered high levels of malnutrition, poor health and infant mortality.

It is generally agreed that when President Ferdinand Marcos established the martial law regime in 1972, most citizens were willing to give him a chance to solve the chronic problems of social and economic inequities and corruption. But after so many years of Marcos' authoritarian rule, that tolerance has come to an end. Instead of social progress, there has been, by all accounts, a widening gap between rich and poor in Philippine society. Both agricultural and urban workers have suffered a dramatic reduction in real wages; malnutrition has grown to an estimated 80 percent of the children of preschool age. An estimated 35 to 40 percent of the labor force is unemployed or underemployed.

During the 1970's and 1980's there has been a steady decline of government services to the desperately poor majority. The land reform program was never fully implemented; rural credit has faded out; government revenues have declined; the government showed little interest in economic development outside Marcos' home island of Luzon.

A severe economic crisis has gripped the Philippines since 1982, which has added fuel to the opposition to the Marcos regime from all sectors of society. During the past three years, the economy has stopped growing and has begun to contract. In 1984, the growth rate was −6 percent; this year, it could be even worse. According to a leading Filipino economist, economic statistics for the first quarter of 1985 indicated an annual rate of −8 percent.

The virtual collapse of the Philippine economy cannot be explained by global economic conditions, since other non-Communist states in Southeast Asia have maintained healthy rates of economic growth over the past few years. A study of the problem by Dr. Bernardo Villegas, an economist at the Center for Research and Communications shows that the decline of the economy had its origins in the mid-1970's, when the absolute power assumed by President Marcos under the martial law regime enabled him to set up government-sponsored corporations controlled by his relatives and cronies in various sectors of the economy. These corporations were given low-interest government loans and other advantages which were financed, especially after 1978, by borrowing from the international banking system. When many of these "crony corporations" lost money or failed completely, because of unwise investments and mismanagement, the Marcos regime, through various government-controlled banks, bailed them out or continued to subsidize them. These subsidies and bail-outs were also financed from borrowing on the international banking system.

In the agricultural sector, the Marcos regime has created monopolies under the control of close friends, such as Robert Benedicto (sugar) and Eduardo Cojuangco (coconuts), which allowed them to siphon off enormous profits at the expense of everyone else. These policies have contributed to the sharp decline of both sectors and have required enormous budgetary subsidies by the government. The IMF has demanded in 1984 negotiations that these monopolies be replaced by more decentralized management of the sugar and coconut sectors as a condition for further loans. Marcos has agreed to carry out far reaching reform of the bodies managing both sectors, but U.S. officials say that the changes he has made have been only cosmetic in character, leaving his cronies' control unaffected.

The Philippines, whose foreign debt in 1972 was only $1.9 billion, now has a staggering $26 billion in foreign debt, and its ratio of debt to export earnings puts it in the same category as Argentina, Chile, Brazil and Mexico. However, the structure of the Philippine debt is actually worse than those of the other countries, because its ratio of short-term debt to long-term debt is two to three times higher. A significant proportion of the increases in foreign debt during the late 1970's and early 1980's has been the result of the Marcos system of "crony capitalism".

The mismanagement of the economy has been the major cause of massive disinvestment on the part of Filipino businessmen during the 1970's and early 1980's. That disinvestment in turn brought about the decline in GNP that began in 1982. The Aquino assassination, and the strong suspicion that the highest levels of government might have been responsible for it, accelerated the withdrawal of investment capital by Filipino businessmen from the Philippine economy. It is estimated by Dr. Villegas that a total of $10 to 30 billion owned by Filipino businessmen have been invested abroad in recent years. Foreign investment in the Philippines has also declared in recent years. The business leaders with whom I spoke were firmly convinced that this capital, which is vital to the future economic health of the country, will not return unless and until there is a democratic government which respects the rule of law and normal checks and balances.

II. THE COMMUNIST INSURGENCY AND THE PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

A little more than a year ago, the U.S. Embassy in Manila began to view the insurgency of the New People's Army with a sense of urgency. It now believes that the NPA could be in a position to contend for national power within a few years—a sharp revision of the assessment as late as 1983. Embassy officials emphasized during our discussions that the NPA is markedly different from the Hukbalahup movement of the late 1940's and early 1950's in that it is nationwide in character, rather than being limited to Central Luzon. The NPA is now active in every one of the 73 provinces and militarily active in 62 of them.

One U.S. official familiar with U.S. intelligence gave me the estimate that, of a total population of 54 million people, only about twelve million, or a little over 20 percent, staunchly oppose the NPA, while another 12 million are susceptible to NPA influence. He regards the remaining 30 million as indifferent to the struggle.

The Catholic Church is the only institution in the Philippines with the moral authority to challenge both the Marcos administration and the NPA. At the local level Catholic priests are both opinion leaders and weathervanes of popular attitudes. So it is extremely significant, in my view, that a leading Catholic layman has reported on the basis of a survey of parish priests in 10 provinces that 25 to 30 percent of the priests are already sympathetic to the NPA, and that the percentage is continuing to increase. If the NPA wins over most of Catholic clergy, it is well on its way to winning the country.

The success of the insurgency was explained by Ambassador Bosworth in terms of popular suspicions of the central government, the general decline of the level of government services, and violence against civilians by government troops. Most of the rank and file NPA, according to Ambassador Bosworth, join the insurgency out of alienation, fear and revenge against the abuses committed by the Armed Forces of the Philippines (AFP) and the Philippine Constabulary (PC), the paramilitary arm of the police.

The NPA has taken advantage of this situation to establish an image of protecting popular interests against the government. Those who have been following the problem most closely in the Embassy told me that a purely military response to the NPA problem would only ensure that the government will continue to lose the loyalty of the population and will ultimately be defeated. The key to reversing the present alarming trends in the growth of the NPA military forces and control of population, they said, is a credible, legitimate government and an army which is no longer perceived by the population as the enemy. That would require in particular an end to military abuses against civilians, including the extrajudicial killings of civilians known informally as "salvaging", and the terrorization of citizens who may have given food or shelter to the NPA or are suspected of sympathizing with it.

U.S. officials believe that the Armed Forces of the Philippines is failing to bring the insurgency under control. As one U.S. military officer declared in a meeting with me, "We've got an ineffective armed forces and an insurgency that's growing day by day." A specialist on the insurgency pointed out that the NPA is taking over the countryside with such speed that time is running out on the Philippine government. This official agreed with the estimate given by Assistant Secretary of Defense Armitage that the NPA could be as strong as the government militarily within three to five years but thought it might happen even sooner.

U.S. officials said they believe that acting Chief of Staff General Fidel Ramos and Minister of Defense Juan Ponce Enrile have finally recognized that major changes must be made in the AFP to increase its effectiveness. They noted that it has been only in the past several months that the Embassy has been able to conduct realistic discussions with them on the seriousness of the problem.

Other Embassy officials warned, however, that it is unclear whether these officials are capable of turning the deteriorating situation around. They observed that Enrile and Ramos are constrained in their ability to initiate personnel changes by the fact that most of the commanding generals of the AFP are loyal to General Fabian Ver, the former Chief of Staff. Ver, who is very close to President Marcos, is now on trial for his alleged involvement in the assassination of opposition leader Benigno Aquino in August 1983. Nevertheless, a statement pledging "unwavering loyalty" to Ver was signed by 68 Generals and flag officers, signifying Ver's continued domination of the military.

Of the 90 active duty generals in the AFP today, 30 are past retirement age, but have been kept on active duty by President Marcos. Most of these "overstaying generals" are considered political appointees whose main function is to protect the interests of Marcos and Ver in the military.

Both Defense Minister Enrile and Gen. Ramos told me they emphatically oppose the extension of active duty for these "overstaying generals" (even though Ramos himself also falls into this category). But they implied that they cannot do anything about the problem without the support of President Marcos. Marcos himself has publicly declared his intention to reinstate Ver as Chief of Staff if he is acquitted of the charges in the Aquino assassination, thus creating the impression among Filipinos that the outcome of the trial is a foregone conclusion. Most Americans and Filipinos with whom I talked expect Ver to be acquitted and to be reinstated by Marcos. That would be a serious blow to the chances for genuine reform of the AFP.

In our meeting, Enrile seemed to be arguing that the NPA problem is manageable without any major changes in organization or policy by the AFP. He emphasized that the NPA had little chance of winning without advancing from guerrilla warfare to main force warfare, and suggested that the NPA would be "lucky" to reach the stage of strategic stalemate within five to ten years. The Defense Minister also asserted that the AFP has already reversed the initiative on the battle-field. The NPA took the initiative in seventy percent of the contacts in 1984, he said, but the AFP has taken the initiative in sixty percent of the contacts so far this year. He said the AFP should be "alarmed" only if the NPA starts using artillery against it.

This view is a good deal more optimistic about the main trends in the conflict than that of U.S. officials in Manila. Even more disturbing, however, was the refusal of Enrile and Ramos to acknowledge that the AFP has a serious problem with abuses of civilians. He attributed reports of "salvaging" to "propaganda by radical anti-government groups". He also claimed that the AFP had investigated several cases in which such killings by AFP personnel had been alleged by human rights groups and had found no evidence to support the allegations.

U.S. Embassy officials indicated that the AFP and the Ministry of Defense are well aware that "salvaging" is continuing, however, and that they know the U.S. Embassy is also aware of it. The refusal of Enrile and Ramos to admit frankly in conversation with me that extrajudicial killings are a serious problem and to discuss the ways in which they intend to tackle it suggested to me that the government has not yet decided firmly to address the issue.

Enrile and Ramos have agreed to reforms in the previous AFP procurement system which will eliminate the systematic graft and corruption which previously surrounded the purchase of military equipment by the AFP. They have also agreed to the reorientation of procurement away from modern weapon systems like the F-16 fighter plan and toward enhancing force readiness through the purchase of basic items like trucks and communications equipment, and to the establishment of an effective operations and maintenance system. In addition, they have set up centers for the retraining of troops whose performance in the field has been particularly poor. But on the critical problem of military abuses and extrajudicial killings, U.S. officials say, the leadership of the AFP has yet to propose any concrete actions.

The attitude of President Marcos and the First Lady toward the insurgency has been to refuse to recognize—at least publicly—the urgency of the situation. The day before I met with him, President Marcos wrote to the heads of two ASEAN governments, Indonesian President Suharto and Singapore's Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew, arguing that reports of the strength and influence of the NPA had been exaggerated. In the letter, Marcos claimed that the guerrillas had political and military infrastructure in only four percent of the country's villages and could "occasionally" visit another nine percent.

These figures contrasted sharply with the U.S. Embassy's estimate that the NPA influences one-third of the villages in the country. One Embassy official told me he believed the figures in Marcos' letter were simply fabricated.

III. THE POLITICAL CRISIS: MARCOS, THE DEMOCRATIC OPPOSITION AND FREE ELECTIONS

The massive failure of the economy and the outrage of the Aquino assassination have revived the relatively quiescent democratic opposition movement. After twelve years of authoritarian rule, during which the Marcos regime systematically repressed all political opposition, the democratic opposition has begun to recover its self-confidence and a fragile hope for peaceful political change. Dr. Emmanuel Soriano, former President of the University of the Philippines, observed that, "During martial law, our political growth was stunted. Now we are going through a process of rebuilding the institutions."

This process is a tenuous one, however, and it could be crushed by the Marcos regime unless the U.S. supports the restoration of democracy with firmness and consistency.

The initial manifestation of the democratic opposition was a series of mass demonstrations and protests against the regime that were notable for the participation of the urban professional and business class. In response to the nearly universal perception that the Marcos regime was complicit in the assassination of Benigno Aquino, an estimated four million people participated in some way in protests connected with the funeral. In late 1983 and 1984 the entire urban population appeared to express its desire for a change of government.

The crucial issue for the democratic opposition was whether or not to try to participate in Marcos-sponsored elections. Many opposition figures respected for their dedication to democratic principles feared that participation in May 1984 elections for the national parliament would merely help legitimize the Marcos regime without doing anything to end it, because of the regime's long history of using manipulated elections to strengthen its power. They organized a campaign to boycott the elections and, after the government party had succeeded in winning two-thirds of the parliamentary seats, called their mass demonstrations the "Parliament in the Streets" to emphasize the impotence of the Marcos/dominated parliament.

Others in the democratic opposition, however, felt that the electoral route was the only possible means of removing Marcos from power. They were willing to participate in the elections, provided that Marcos accredited the National Citizens Movement for Free Elections (Namfrel), an organization of volunteer poll-watchers whose aim was to ensure that the ballots were cast freely and counted fairly. Accreditation meant that Namfrel representatives had the authority to observe the counting of the votes at the precinct level.

Namfrel mobilized some 150,000 volunteers to observe the polling in approximately 40 percent of the nation's precincts. Although allegations of government fraud and intimidation were widespread, and Marcos' political party, the KBL, maintained a two-thirds majority in the parliament, Namfrel did make the difference in many cases between a fraudulent outcome and a fair one. Opposition parliamentarian Ramon Mitra of the PDP-Laban Party pointed out that in his constituency, where he ran against a Marcos cabinet member, the larger the Namfrel presence, the bigger was the vote for his candidacy.

The limited success of Namfrel in enforcing free and fair elections in a significant percentage of the 1984 races, combined with extremely high voter turnout, estimated at 85 percent, has brought a new surge of interest in trying to defeat Marcos through the electoral process. The opposition groups which boycotted last year's elections now concede that most Filipinos want to participate in elections. They have now decided to participate in the 1986 local elections on a selective basis and to play a role in trying to defeat Marcos in the 1987 Presidential election.

An official of Namfrel stated that he had seen a "tremendous change" in people's willingness to sacrifice and take risks for a democratic system. Many of its volunteer poll-watchers have told Namfrel officials that they are determined to go ahead with their poll-watching efforts in the 1986 elections, even if the government refuses to give them legal status.

The attention of the opposition has been focused in recent months on the possibility of a sudden election should President Marcos be unable to serve. Under legislation passed by the parliament last year, the Speaker of the parliament would automatically succeed President Marcos upon his death, and a new election for President would be held within 45 to 60 days. Since last November, when President Marcos became seriously ill and did not appear in public for several weeks, the problem of a possible emergency election has taken on new significance. The U.S. Embassy's assessment is that if Marcos is well enough he will definitely run for the Presidency in 1987. However, if the President's health is such that he is unable to do so, it is unclear whether or not he would encourage the First Lady, Imelda Marcos, to run. It is clear, however, that Mrs. Marcos has carefully cultivated Gen. Ver's support to make a run for the Presidency should her husband be unable to do so.

Opposition groups feel that they have a better chance of defeating Mrs. Marcos than they would President Marcos in the 1987 election. Former Senator Jovito Salonga, who boycotted both the 1981 Presidential election and the 1984 parliamentary elections, said the opposition considers an election campaign against Mrs. Marcos "too good a chance to pass up."

With this in mind, the opposition has been making serious efforts since December to unify behind a single candidate to run against the government candidate in the event of a sudden election. A Convenor Group organized by Senator Aquino's widow, Corazon (Cory) Aquino, businessman Jaime Ongpin, and the nationalist ex-Senator Lorenzo Tanada have brought together eleven opposition figures considered potential candidates for the Presidency in an effort to work out a process by which a single opposition candidate could be chosen. The agreement, signed by all but two of the eleven, called for a majority of the group to choose the opposition candidate by secret ballot. If one candidate could not command a majority of votes after five rounds, the three convenors would then join them in voting. If a candidate still could not be chosen after three more ballots, the three convenors themselves would choose the candidate by a majority vote.

Those political figures and groups who were not satisfied with the Convenor Group's election of "Potential Standard Bearers" have formed a "National Unification Committee" and are planning their own convention to choose a candidate. But Mrs. Aquino, representing the Convenor Group, and former Supreme Court Justice Cecilia Munoz-Palma, representing the National Unification Committee, have been authorized to work together to arbitrate the differences between the two groups by working out a common plan for selecting a single oposition candidate. Despite the apparent obstacles to unity, Mrs. Aquino said she was not concerned. She indicated that it would be dangerous to single out a leader of the opposition now, because, "He might be liquidated."

Whether the election is held as scheduled in 1987 or occurs earlier, opposition forces face some major disadvantages in trying to oust the Marcos regime through elections. In a country racked by massive poverty, money is an extremely important political asset and the regime is expected to spend lavishly in buying votes. According to businessmen in the opposition, the Philippine Chinese Chamber of Commerce has already raised a slush fund of $200 million for the KBL's campaign, while reserving $2 million for the opposition. Cory Aquino indicated that the opposition expects to be outspent by the Marcos regime by a 200 to 1 ratio.

The opposition nevertheless believes that money alone will not win the election for the Marcos regime. Those involved in last year's parlimentary elections observed that the traditional technique of buying votes did not work in many places last May. "Marcos distributed the money through Barangay captains," a Namfrel official observed. "They were called to the palace and given money three different times. But people took the money and voted against Marcos' candidates anyway."

A second advantage for the Marcos regime is the fact that the KBL already has a nationwide political structure reaching all the way down to the local level. The nation's 42,000 barangay or precinct leaders, who were elected in a non-partisan campaign in 1982, were absorbed into the KBL party after their election. The opposition, on the other hand, is strong in Metro Manila and other cities but has little organization in the rural areas. Unless the opposition can win a significant proportion of local offices in the elections scheduled for May 1986, the Marcos regime will be able to control the presidential election more easily.

However, opposition strategists are not dispirited by the official apparatus. They point out that in almost every barangay, the 1982 local elections were contested, and the losers are the natural allies of the opposition there. They also expect Namfrel to be a larger, more effective presence in the barangays than they were in last year's elections. The organizers of Namfrel say that they did not have enough time or money to send pollwatchers into all areas where they were needed. This year they intend to target all of the approximately 100,000 voting centers in the country. They also hope that sixteen independent Catholic radio stations, as well as Radio Veritas, which is funded by the Catholic Bishops of Southeast Asia, will provide the communications network for the Namfrel effort. That network will be backed by amateur radio operators sending messages directly from the polling places.

But opposition parlimentarians, businessmen and party leaders were in agreement that the two absolutely vital conditions for curbing the fraud and violence that the Marcos regime might otherwise carry out in local and presidential elections is an independent Commission on Elections (Comelec) and official accreditation of Namfrel, which provides a necessary oversight mechanism for the counting of ballots at the local level. In the past the national-level Comelec has been comprised of Marcos supporters. As a result, local and province or city election committees have been stacked with Marcos supporters. In last year's parliamentary elections, Marcos made only a slight concession in response to popular pressure to make Comelec independent: he named an independent figure to the nine-member committee. It wasn't enough to make any difference in the conduct of the election, since the pro-Marcos majority could always vote to accept its own vote totals at the precinct and province or city level.

Since the May 1984 elections, President Marcos has made no move toward reform of Comelec. Instead, he has signalled his intention of maintaining tight political control over the electoral process. In May, he named Victor Savellano, a member of his own KBL party, to replace the retiring Chairman of Comelec. The new Chairman was so lacking in impartiality that he publicy declared his loyalty to President Marcos upon being named to the post.

Opposition figures are united in demanding that Comelec be made truly neutral and nonpartisan. They want a new chairman who is not loyal to the Marcos regime and new members who are independent, but they do not demand that members of the Commission be associated with the opposition.

The situation in the Philippines is strikingly similar, in its broad outlines, to that in Guatemala, where another authoritarian regime has pledged to undertake a transition to democratic rule. There, however, the government has agreed to the creation of an Electoral Tribunal whose members are chosen from a list of names submitted by a committee comprised of respected figures from the legal community, thus insuring that its independence will be accepted by the democratic opposition. The principle involved in this procedure is obviously an important one, and that principle is bing breached by the policy of the Marcos regime toward the Electoral Commission.

Namfrel represents the main obstacle to election fraud at the precinct level. Where Namfrel was unable to operate last May, the fraud and intimidation were frequently alleged. Cory Aquino cited the example of one precinct in Tarlac province in which the opposition candidate got only 8 votes out of 8,000. Opposition parliamentarian Ramon Mitra recalled that in some precincts where Namfrel was absent there were more votes for government candidates than registered voters.

The democratic opposition sees an officially sanctioned Namfrel as the minimum condition for elections that would give them any chance of defeating Marcos. "If Namfrel could be enfranchised early, it would give the opposition a lift," said Jamie Ongpin. "But it has to go together with an independent Comelec; otherwise it would be meaningless."

President Marcos, who agreed to the accreditation of Namfrel for last year's elections, withdrew that status as soon as the election was over. He has refused to renew it for the elections scheduled for 1986 and 1987, charging that it is an opposition organization. There have been reports that he is planning to create a new pollwatching organization which he will have accredited for the coming elections instead of Namfrel. The organization would be ostensibly independent but would in fact be manipulated by the government. The current draft of the electoral code proposed by the government party in the parliament calls for the decision on accreditation to be made by the Electoral Commission. If the Marcos administration proceeds as it has so far on the 1986 elections, it would destroy the credibility of elections in general.

The free political atmosphere necessary for the electoral process to be meaningful is also threatened in the Philippines by the Marcos administration's arbitrary powers of arrest and detention. The suspension of the writ of habeas corpus in what the government calls national security cases during the martial law period has been maintained by means of Preventive Detention Actions. These actions have been issued regularly in the absence of formal charges, and detention is often for indefinite periods and in defiance of court-ordered releases. According to former Supreme Court Justice Cecilia Munoz-Palma, President Marcos has routinely signed blank Preventive Detention Actions and given them to the military to arrest and detain individuals who could not be convicted of a crime. The refusal of the President Marcos to give up his arbitrary power to arrest and detain has been resisted not only by the legal community in the Philippines, but by the Catholic Church as well. The use of Preventive Detention Actions, combined with the almost universal belief that high officials were involved in the Aquino assassination have created a general feeling that those who oppose the Marcos regime no longer have any legal protection from physical repression.

Without U.S. pressure on Marcos, the opposition fears that the 1986 and 1987 elections will simply be repeats of the 1984 experience. "The electoral code would look good," Ongpin explained, "but he would withhold his ace and refuse to purge Comelec. So the KBL would lose in Manila and win outside." Everyone I met in the opposition expressed the belief that President and Mrs. Marcos will cling to power by keeping tight control over the electoral process.

Both Embassy officials and opposition leaders believe that, if the Marcos regime wins the coming elections through widespread fraud, violence and intimidation, the result would be a rapid increase in support for the NPA insurgency. Cory Aquino best articulated the opposition's view of the consequences of yet another rigged election: "If we don't succeed in the next presidential election," she said, "people will say we've gone along with you moderates long enough." Senator Salonga suggested that the NPA would actually prefer that Mrs. Marcos win the election, if she turns out to be the candidate, because "she would be their best recruiter."

The elections of 1986 and 1987 are seen by the democratic opposition as the last chance to restore a democratically-oriented leadership to power in the Philippines. In a discussion with some members of the business community one official of Namfrel expressed the fear that, unless the change to a different leadership is made through elections during the next two years, "it will be far more difficult to achieve peaceful change in the future." No one among the six moderate critics of the regime participating in the discussion disagreed.

The democratic opposition fears that the U.S. will continue to provide economic and military assistance to the Marcos regime without demanding specific steps toward democracy, including the conditions for free elections mentioned above. Opposition figures stated in no uncertain terms that such a policy would be a disaster for Philippine democracy. Far from regarding conditioning U.S. aid to Marcos as an infringment on Philippine sovereignty, they viewed it as U.S. support for the self-determination of the Filipino people. For the democratic opposition, firm pressures from the U.S. that go beyond mere advice to Marcos on issues of democratization is the only hope for peaceful change.

IV. U.S. NAVAL FACILITY AT SUBIC BAY

Briefings from Rear Admiral Edwin Kohn, Commander of the U.S. Naval Facility at Subic Bay, and his staff impressed upon me the importance of that base to the U.S. military posture in the Pacific and Indian Oceans.

The Subic Bay facility has an ideally protected harbor and a position close to the sea lanes of communication through Southeast Asia and the Indian Ocean that cannot be duplicated elsewhere. It is home port for two of the three carrier task forces in the Pacific Fleet, and has an average of 12 ships in port on any given day. Subic provides fleet support services for those ships, including a ship repair facility with three floating, deployable drydocks, and 4,500 Filipino repair personnel. The supply depot at Subic provides for the needs of all ships that home port there. It supplies the fuel not only for ships and planes of the U.S. fleet, but also for Clark Airbase through an underground pipeline.

The Naval Air Station at Cubi Point is the base for a naval air squadron which logs 13,000 take-offs and landings every month, and is also home to Orion P-3 surveillance planes. Subic's naval hospital has an 84-bed capacity under normal conditions, which can be expanded to 125 in an emergency. Subic also has the facilities for training naval personnel away from sealanes and population centers, as well as for rest and recreation.

As Admiral Kohn explained, there is no other place in the world where all these facilities are situated together in such a convenient location and at such a low cost. At the ship repair facility, the cost of labor is only $50 per man-day. "While the facilities could be replaced," Admiral Kohn told me, "they could never be duplicated." Fall-back positions in Guam and Tinian are further away from the sealanes themselves, compounding the problems of maintaining a U.S. presence in the Indian Ocean.

Admiral Kohn's briefing also underlined the degree to which the use of the bases at Subic and Clark depends on the outcome of the current struggle in the Philippines. The facility at Subic and the fuel pipeline to Clark are extremely vulnerable to sabotage, since they are located in a densely populated area which is subject to growing influence by the New People's Army and the Communist Party of the Philippines. According to Admiral Kohn, the NPA has large influence throughout Central Luzon and has begun to influence a number of barangays in Bataan and Zimbales provinces, which are near the base. In all there are an estimated 700 NPA regular troops in Bataan, Zimbales and Pampanga provinces alone and some 5,000 in Luzon as a whole. Even the base's internal security is assumed to be constantly penetrated by the NPA through the thousands of Filipino civilians who go in and out every day.

The NPA could probably make the normal operation of both Subic and Clark impossible if it chose to do so. So far, however, the NPA has chosen to leave Subic and Clark alone, and Admiral Kohn believes that neither will become a target, because these bases are the only livelihood for the entire region of Cental Luzon. "If we are targetted," he said, "it would be counterproductive to what the NPA is trying to do."

According to Admiral Kohn, the two U.S. facilities at Subic and Clark employ about 40,000 Filipinos, making it the second largest employer in the Philippines outside the Philippine government. The Subic facility injects an estimated quarter of a billion pesos into the economy each year and Clark another 100 million pesos, for a total of 350 million pesos (about $20 million at the current official rate of exchange) per year. It is also believed that for every peso spent by the bases, there is a multiplier effect of five or six, making them an even more important factor in the Philippine economy.

Although the Communists apparently have no interest in disrupting base operations while they build up their political-military strength, an NPA military victory would clearly jeopardize U.S. use of the bases in the longer run. That is why U.S. security interests in the Philippines depend on an effective response to the rising NPA insurgency.

V. UNITED STATES POLICY: COMING TO GRIPS WITH THE PHILIPPINE CRISIS

The U.S. Embassy in Manila is attempting to encourage President Marcos to implement political, economic and military reforms and is willing to give his government the benefit of the doubt that it is moving in the right direction on these issues. Ambassador Bosworth pointed to "incremental changes" he felt Marcos had already carried out: the May 1984 National Assembly elections, which he judged a great improvement over previous elections in terms of fairness; moves that Marcos has made toward dismantling the sugar and coconut monopolies; and the willingness of the armed forces to concentrate on force readiness rather than procurement of modern aircraft and large naval vessels. He also suggested that Marcos has lost some of his power and has had to be more responsive to public opinion than in the past.

U.S. officials maintain that different issues require different policy approaches by the U.S. On economic policy the U.S. might be willing to withhold some aid resources because economic restructuring to liberalize the economy had not taken place. With regard to the professionalization of the AFP, the U.S. approach is to increase MAP funding, on the assumption that "putting more chips on the table" will give the U.S. more leverage on the Philippine government to reform the military leadership and policies. But any reduction in military aid, according to the administration, would open the U.S. to the charge of "bad faith" regarding the 1983 agreement on military bases by the Marcos regime.

It appears that U.S. efforts to move the Philippine government toward significant reforms may be constricted by the official belief that the 1983 bases agreement with the Philippines requires the provision of approximately $180 million in security assistance per year. Threatening to reduce military assistance to a longtime ally who argues that it is "rent" for U.S. use of the bases is an unpleasant diplomatic course which the administration understandably would like to avoid.

Yet the alternative, in my view, is far more serious. Embassy officials believe that the political-military situation in the rural areas is deteriorating very rapidly, and they doubt that President Marcos is ready to give up his political control of the military and move toward democratization. The implications of this fact are twofold: first, Marcos will try to limit substantive political and military reforms over the next two years to a minimum, and try to ensure that elections will further consolidate his regime; second, the insurgency will continue to grow, taking advantage of popular disaffection.

There are indications that key officials of the Marcos Administration, including Marcos himself, understand how dangerously weak the Philippine government is politically in trying to carry out a counterinsurgency war against the NPA. In February, Labor Minister Blas Ople declared publicly that there were signs that the will to resist the NPA was breaking down. He warned that once that will has collapsed, "the Communists can take over and occupy Manila—without firing a shot."

Only a few weeks ago, President Marcos, who had previously maintained that the NPA insurgency was under control, spoke for the first time about the possibility that he might have to call on "allied troops" if the NPA had too much outside help and foreign training. Since the NPA is conceded by U.S. officials to be a purely indigenous phenomenon, this sounded like the beginning of a campaign to claim that NPA successes are due to outside support.

This situation requires that we review our options in the Philippines, taking into account the high risks of continuing on our present courses as well as those of a more forceful stance toward Marcos.

We must consider realistically whether present policy can achieve the political-military reforms necessary to reverse the very serious trend in the strength of the Communist insurgency in the Philippines. That policy calls for increasing the level of military assistance in FY 1986 by 150 percent over the FY 1985 level. This is $15 million above what would be required to maintain a flat rate of military assistance under the "best efforts" commitment. The rationale, as explained by Ambassador Bosworth, is that additional assistance beyond the "best efforts" pledge gives the U.S. leverage on the Marcos government to professionalize the AFP and control military abuses.

There is a serious question in my mind, however, whether the difference between the $100 million now requested by the administration and the $85 million the administration says it must provide in any case, gives us any meaningful leverage on the Marcos government. It is not clear that Marcos feels that he stands to lose much if he simply reinstates Gen. Ver or one of his cronies as Chief of Staff and thus assures the loyalty of the military. I am concerned that the U.S. government might not be able to succeed in bringing about the dramatic change in military leadership which everyone agrees is necessary.

I am also concerned that the Reagan Administration may be tempted to adopt a passive role on the fundamental issue of democratization. In my view, we would be sending the worst possible signal if we relax the pressure on the Marcos regime, especially with regard to free elections and democratic rights.

Since my trip and the 89-8 vote in the Senate in favor of the resolution offered by Senator Frank Murkowski and myself which addressed the above concerns, the human rights and political situation has deteriorated still further. Therefore, the alternative of withholding at least a significant portion of military and Economic Support Fund assistance to Marcos until a number of political and military reforms have been carried out deserves serious consideration if current trends are not soon reversed.

While this form of leverage may be dismissed by some as inconsistent with the 1983 bases agreement and with the Marcos government's expectations of annual "rent" for use of the bases, we need to be clear about the nature of the U.S. commitment on aid in connection with that agreement. U.S. negotiators never agreed to consider U.S. security assistance as "rent", nor can the executive branch make such a commitment on behalf of Congress. The President's pledge was only to make his "best effort" to obtain a given level of assistance from Congress.

The risks of failing to use all the leverage at the command of the U.S. to move Marcos toward free elections, political freedoms and control of military abuses seem to me far more serious than whatever uncertainties may be posed by conditioning military aid. We face the very real possibility in the Philippines of another third world country succumbing to a Communist movement because the democratic alternative was not given a chance.

The Marcos regime may be strong enough to resist the demands of the democratic opposition, but it does not have enough popular support to reverse the present trends toward insurgent political-military gains. Even the incremental changes undertaken by the government last year now appear to be jeopardized by actions which President Marcos has taken recently. Moreover, there have been reports from the Philippines in recent weeks of a new wave of violations of human rights, including extrajudicial killings, which suggest that the government is continuing to move in the wrong direction.

A failure to take a firm position on democratization in the Philippines now would also jeopardize future Philippine-American friendship. It would confirm the growing tendency among Filipinos—particularly those who came of political age during and since the martial law period—to see U.S. policy as concerned only with the use of military bases in the Philippines. Many Filipinos are angry about the U.S. role in the Philippines because they believe that it involves a quid pro quo of support for Marcos in return for base rights. As one opposition member of parliament put it to me, "The U.S. has two military bases in search of a policy toward the Philippines. That is why you are caught in a bind supporting an unpopular dictator like Marcos."

This trip has brought home to me the fact that our strategic interests in the Philippines must be more solidly based on support for democratic government and social and economic progress in that country than it has in the recent past. It is not simply because the U.S. had responsibility in the Philippines for nearly half a century or that Filipinos and Americans fought side by side during World War II that the U.S. has an obligation to support the popular aspirations of the Filipino people for democracy and human rights. What is even more important is that the Filipino people have a long tradition of respect for law and of functioning democratic institutions. There remains, even after thirteen years of martial law and authoritarian rule—or perhaps because of that experience—a tremendous popular desire in the Philippines for the kind of freedoms that the U.S. should stand for in the world. Millions of people have shown by their actions this past year and a half that they want a democratic system, with free elections, checks and balances and respect for basic human rights.

There are few third world countries where the opportunity to support a genuine democratic alternative to authoritarianism of the left or the right is so clear and compelling as in the Philippines. Democracy now hangs in the balance there. We owe it to the Filipino people as well as to our own interests to support their demands for democracy with more than words.

[From the Boston Globe, July 30, 1985]

THE PHILIPPINE HOSTAGES

The Philippines today resemble the Nicaragua or the Iran of 10 years ago. President Ferdinand Marcos has lost touch with his people, and his people are losing patience with him. Marcos's associates have accrued wealth through a corrupt system backed by a brutal incompetent military. Popular support for the Marxist New People's Army is growing. As economic crisis deepens and political crisis festers, it has become obvious that rapid reform is the only way to avert upheaval.

Marcos is prepared neither to reform the system nor to allow the democratic opposition to do it. Like the shah of Iran and the dictator Somoza. Marcos assumes that because he is pro-American, he can count on US support.

Marcos blamed the New People's Army's insurrection on "the integration of aid and foreign-trained troops," and hinted at invoking a 1951 mutual-defense treaty to draw US troops into fighting his battles for him. He made clear that he believes he holds two important hostages, Clark Air Force Base and the Subic Bay Naval Base. Marcos repeated a perennial threat to deprive the United States of the bases.

US policy makers should call Marcos's bluff. This is a case in which the hostages are expendable. A conspicuous order to the Pentagon to update its plans for relocating the Philippine bases would send a signal to both Marcos and his critics that the United States has learned from past mistakes. The democratic opposition would be heartened. The violent left would lose an invaluable forensic target; "the US-Marcos dictatorship."

Clark Field and Subic Bay are undeniably important to the US strategic position in the Pacific and the Indian Ocean. They cannot be duplicated, but neither are they irreplacable. Other sites at Guam, Tinian, Singapore and Australia would serve. Certainly the Philippine bases are not worth a US war to sustain a discredited regime.

The Philippine people have notable strengths in their judicial system, their advanced system of education and their identification with many American political values. If Marcos would get out of the way, the opposition could manage the rapid evolutionary change needed to forestall violent revolution. An intelligent US policy could provide the opportunity.

Marcos expects the United States to lose its nerve because of its narrow interest in the bases. This is the moment to show him he is wrong. Philippine democracy, symbolizing values the United States hopes to see thriving around the world, is too rare to be bartered for runways, drydocks, fuel tanks and barracks.

RECESS UNTIL 11:30 A.M.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now stand in recess until 11:30 a.m.

Thereupon, at 10:43 a.m., the Senate recessed until 11:30 a.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. WARNER).

RECESS

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate be in recess until 12 noon.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 11:30 a.m., recessed until 12 noon; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. KASTEN).

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, my understanding is that in just a few moments we will start the supplemental appropriations bill, H.R. 2577, and hopefully we will conclude action on that. Following disposition of the supplemental appropriations bill, it is my hope we can clean up some miscellaneous items prior to 2 o'clock.

We had scheduled from 1 to 3 o'clock debate on the cost of the farm programs. We did extend the recess from 11:30 to 12 noon at the request of the distinguished minority leader. I hope that now we can pick up that half-hour or hour on the farm discussion and maybe have that from 2 to 4 o'clock, because we have taken some time away from the supplemental appropriations bill.

I can also indicate that the Republicans did have a conference this morning on the budget resolution. The budget conferees should be meeting at this moment. I cannot speak for all Republicans who were there, I think there were 41 or 42. But, in any event, we hope to take up the budget resolution conference report this afternoon and dispose of it.

Beyond that, that would leave the South Africa conference report. I am advised, as I have indicated earlier, that there will be a number of Members who wish to discuss that at length. If it appears that "at length" means beyond tomorrow evening, we may either decide to call it up today, file a cloture motion, or let those who oppose it discuss it tonight and tomorrow, and then file a cloture motion so that we can vote on cloture when we return.

Beyond that, the only other outstanding matter we have on our list is the energy and water appropriations bill. I know the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee is prepared to move on that. I understand that there are a number of amendments. That would take a number of hours. We could do that this evening, but there may be some objection to taking that up at this time.

On the Genocide Treaty, I have also been advised there will be lengthy debate on that matter. I will discuss that today with the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Senator LUGAR, and make a final announcement on that sometime this afternoon.

The other matter we had hoped to at least bring to the floor would be a farm bill. I know at this moment there is a meeting in the White House, a Cabinet meeting, on farm legislation and farm credit legislation. There are also some who believe that we should wait to see what the final budget figure will be, if, in fact, there is a House-Senate agreement on a budget resolution, before we take what some have called precipitous action. So we will see what happens there in the next few hours.

It would seem to me if we can do the items that I have suggested, we could conclude our work this evening. If not, we would be here tomorrow.

Mr. Presdient, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, FISCAL YEAR 1985—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on H.R. 2577 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill. (H.R. 2577) making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their repective Houses this report, signed by a majority of the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

(The conference report is printed in the House proceedings of the Record of July 31, 1985.)

The Senator from Oregon is recognized.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, the conference report on H.R. 2577, the fiscal year 1985 Supplemental appropriations bill recommends a total of $13,009,352,536 for program and pay supplementals to continue operations of the Federal Government for the remainder of the current fiscal year. This amount is $405,763,000 below the House-passed level and $920,395,000 below the Senate-passed level. It is $124,399,100 above the administration's requested level.

A number of major items requested by the President are recommended in this conference report. These include: $3.5 billion for payment to the Social Security trust funds; $2.936 billion for reimbursement of net realized losses of the Commodity Credit Corporation [CCC], adjusted to reflect the prior provision of $1 billion for the CCC in the urgent supplemental signed into law by the President on July 24 (Public Law 99-71); $2.258 billion for the economic support funds, of which $2 billion is for aid to Egypt and Israel and $250 million is for aid to Jordan; $319 million for food stamps; and $175 million for veterans' compensation and pensions. In addition, the conferees recommend $27 million for humanitarian assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance supported by the administration.

The conferees have recommended $287 million for student financial assistance—Pell grants—to cover the shortfall in the program in academic year 1985-86 not requested by the administration. This amount is the same as that recommended in the Senate-passed bill. Also included is $720,346,000 for guaranteed student loans recommended by both the House and Senate; $55.5 million above the level of the administration's request. The administration's lower amount is contingent on changes in authorizing language requiring action by the appropriate legislative committees.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a table listing these and other major items contained in the conference report on the fiscal year 1985 supplemental appropriations bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, the conference report includes $63.1 million for initiation of construction on water projects by the Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation. As you will recall, the Senate bill included language "fencing" these funds until cost-sharing agreements are reached between the Secretary and the non-Federal project sponsors, and further providing that funds provided for specific projects shall lapse unless such an agreement is reached on that project by June 30, 1986. The administration dropped its opposition to the funding of new water projects based on this language and other assurances that the Senate would act on legislation providing for cost-sharing reforms.

The conferees adopted the Senate position. However, in acting on the conference amendments, the House rejected this position on a vote of 170 to 258. In acting on amendment No. 112 relating to Corps of Engineers construction, the House rejected the conferees' recommendation to accept an amendment incorporating the Senate cost-sharing language, and adopted instead a substitute amendment prohibiting initiation of construction on any of the projects funded unless cost sharing and any other needed authorizing legislation is enacted. Given the strength of the House vote, I recommend that the Senate agree to this language but adopt a further amendment making it effective only through May 15, 1986.

The House also rejected the conference position on one other amendment, amendment No. 262. The House bill recommended a rescission of $7.5 million of the funds available for carrying out a national program to encourage the use of automobile safety belts and passive restraints; the Senate bill recommended a $2 million rescission. The conferees recommended to rescind $3 million of funds available for this program and added language requiring the Secretary of Transportation to rule on the compliance of State mandatory safety belt use laws before available program funds are obligated and making the funds available until September 30, 1986. The conference recommendation was stricken on a point of order in the House. When the Senate acts on this amendment, I will move that the Senate recede to the House position. We are close to the end of the current fiscal year and can address this issue in the context of the regular fiscal year 1986 bill.

Mr. President, I yield to the ranking minority member of our subcommittee, the Senator from Wisconsin, for a statement.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I congratulate the chairman of the Appropriations Committee on this action.

All of us would like these appropriations as low as possible, in view of the size of the deficit. Under the circumstances, I think the conference committee did a good job.

We have checked with the Members on our side, and there is no objection to taking up the bill and acting on it at this time.

Mr. HATFIELD. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. President, this has been a very difficult bill to work out, and it has had nothing but the most bipartisan and excellent support from all members of our committee.

I should like to make a further observation: Because of the complexity of the appropriations process, as contrasted to the time I first went on the committee, when very few people would make most of the decisions in conference, I should like to state for the record the observation that in our conference we have practically every member on both sides of the aisle participating, hammering out the conference report, section by section, chapter by chapter, issue by issue, report by report. It really is a very remarkable demonstration of the comprehensiveness of the participation in our committees, and I am very proud of that.

In fact, 27 of the total membership of the committee of 29 participated in that conference. When you have 27 conferees on one side of a conference, you have a big audience and a big working force. So I commend Senators on both sides who participated so effectively.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, we should not miss one part of this legislation, which is the fact that we now have cost sharing on water projects, and that is something for which the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee deserves special credit. The administration worked for it, and it will result in economies in the future—less spending and less pork barrel, in my view, and more responsible projects.

This was something that was very difficult for many Senators, and I think the distinguished chairman has done an outstanding job in this respect and deserves great credit.

This is a controversial bill with respect to foreign aid and many other areas, but I think we did the best we could under the circumstances, in view of the legislative impasse.

Mr. HATFIELD. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin.

It is a historic and significant portion of this bill, as evidenced by the colloquy that accompanied the action by the Senate on this bill, engaged in by a number of Senators, relating to that very controversial issue of cost sharing.

Mr. President, let me outline the mechanics that we will follow, according to my understanding of the parliamentary situation.

We have about 60 amendments that are in disagreement, which will have to be acted upon en bloc or separately. There is one amendment I will offer at an appropriate time which would urge the Senate not to agree to one of the House amendments; to send back, in effect, a counterproposal; and that relates to the question of the water projects. Perhaps it is well that I should introduce that issue by merely explaining the situation at this point.

When the Senate passed the bill dealing with energy and water, we had a total of 33 or 34 projects. Some of them were authorized and some were not authorized. The ones which were not authorized had been justified by extensive studies indicating that they represented some of the important needs of the infrastructure, particularly in our waterways programs.

We put them in the bill as unauthorized projects, primarily because the authorizing committees of the House and the Senate had not been able to get a comprehensive omnibus authorization bill for 14 years. I am not certain that there is much evidence that we are going to see a great change in that particular situation. But we did put in the cost-sharing requirement that, whether authorized or unauthorized, such projects, particularly as they were starting up construction, would have to engage in an understanding and a contract that the Secretary of the Army have local cost sharing. The Senate worked its will on that, adopted that, and we held to that in the conference.

In the conference activity, the House came in with 66 projects. In the conference, we worked it out for a total of 41, but again maintaining the Senate fence language relating to cost sharing.

When the House acted yesterday on this bill, they had the amendment in disagreement, and they voted to adopt an amendment which would exclude from that section of the appropriations supplemental all unauthorized projects.

That was the way in which the amendment was presented on the floor, and that was led by the chairman and subcommittee chairman of the authorizing committees of the House of Representatives, to adopt that amendment, which was adopted by an 80-vote margin.

Mr. President, since that time, a very careful review has been made by legal staff and others. Let me cite the language that was adopted by the House. It said:

> Notwithstanding any other provision of law (incuding any other provision of this Act), initiation of construction with respect to any project referred to in this paragraph shall be subject to subsequent enactment of legislation specifying the requirements of local cooperation for Water Resources Development Projects . . .

The intent, as I understood the debate on the floor of the House, was to exclude only unauthorized projects. Now it appears that that language includes all the projects in that bill, authorized and unauthorized. The division between the two categories is about 50-50. Out of the total 41 projects in the supplemental, about 20 are authorized and about 21 are unauthorized.

If this language should prevail, it would appear that then it would successfully inhibit any project from proceeding under construction, with or without authorization. I am sure that Members of the House who supported the amendment did not intend that, according to the debate, and I think that those who voted for it probably did not intend that.

Be that as it may, however one might interpret that language, what I am going to propose—and I have cleared it on the Democratic side of the aisle with Senators JOHNSTON, STENNIS, and BYRD—is to recognize the argument of the authorizing committees of the House and say, in effect: "All right, even though there has not been an omnibus bill provided by the authorizing committee that could be signed into law in 14 years, let us put a time certain for you to have a reasonable period of time to produce an authorizing bill. Therefore, we will fence, in effect, your language that was intended to exclude unauthorized projects until May 15, 1986. That, in effect, would say that you have 9 months to produce an authorization. If that 9-month period does not produce an authorization, then the conference report language that was initially agreed to shall take effect."

In other words, we could process with both the authorized and more especially the unauthorized, which seems to be the point of contention, the unauthorized projects, provided they have reached a cost-sharing arrangement, but at least will not totally exclude the opportunity to proceed with cost sharing on such unauthorized projects.

By the law, my colleagues know very well we do much of this on appropriation vehicles, authorizing projects or authorizing other things. There is nothing new about this. It just happens to be this is just one of the more controversial types of authorization. So we are not breaking any new ground, we are not establishing new precedents by authorizing these particular 21 projects.

But all we are doing is saying to the House, have another vote and look at it from the standpoint of a Senate counterproposal that is reasonable, and by the way, I have checked this with the chairman of the Senate authorizing committee and the Senate has also approved of this, the counterproposal as being a fair one and as being one that has reasonable time. We had originally suggested April 16. Senator STAFFORD has suggested another month, rather than 8, give them 9 months, and I am happy to do that. So consequently, that will be proposed in this process that I have outlined.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I understand the administration, the Office of Management and Budget, approves this procedure; is that correct?

Mr. HATFIELD. The main point of contention as the Senator from Wisconsin recalls that we were involved in the CR last October related to the issue of cost sharing more than to the number of projects. Remember this: The administration has requested projects in their budget request, so the question is not projects or no projects. The question is cost sharing. We have worked that out with the administration, the administration has signed off on that and, therefore, to answer the Senator's question, yes.

Mr. PROXMIRE. They do not object to the fact that there would be a period between now and May 1986 in which the Senate could take action, having not taken action in the past. If they do not, as I understand it, then these projects would go forward.

Mr. HATFIELD. Yes.

Mr. PROXMIRE. There is no objection to this on their part as long as there is cost sharing.

Mr. HATFIELD. The question comes back to cost sharing and whatever action, whatever vehicles that the matter of projects are considered upon, the issue of cost sharing is what the administration has been most adamant in their position, and what I can say to the Senator has now been resolved with Mr. Stockman, representing the administration.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I would like to bring to the attention of the Senate an important provision of this supplemental conference agreement relating to Central America. Amidst all of the hoopla concerning renewal of U.S. assistance to the Nicaraguan Contras, most observers have overlooked a provision encouraging economic development in Central America as well as better understanding between ourselves and young leaders in Central America.

The conferees agreed to an amendment that I introduced in the Senate Appropriations Committee which provides $9 million for scholarships and educational exchanges in Central America. A major increase in funding for these programs, to enable the United States to compete with the Soviet Union in educational opportunities, was recommended by the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America and endorsed by the President last year.

I am pleased that Congress has finally acted to adequately fund graduate scholarships and educational exchanges for this vital region, but I am disappointed that an exciting scholarship program for third and fourth year undergraduates from Central America continues to be hobbled by restrictions imposed by a small band of Members in the other House.

All of us agree that prudence requires careful structuring of an initiative such as the Central America Undergraduate Scholarship Program, but to hold a 5-year program for 2,500 Central American scholars to a level of 143 for the first 2 years makes no sense when ten times as many young Central Americans travel each year to Cuba, the Soviet Union, or Eastern Europe. Frankly, if none went to those countries, we should do better than that for these people.

I am not alone in supporting this program, as long as it is carefully managed. Just yesterday, Congress cleared for the President's signature, H.R. 2068, the State-USIA authorization for fiscal year 1986–87. That legislation included several policy provisions endorsing the recommendations of the Kissinger Commission which this $9 million will support. House Majority Leader JIM WRIGHT, as well as an impressive group of Members from both Houses and both parties, support a broader-based effort to boost education in Central America through undergraduate and post-graduate scholarships to study in U.S. institutions.

I expect to return to this issue in the fiscal 1986 appropriation for the U.S. Information Agency. Perhaps it is time to bring the matter to a vote, to test whether Members agree that undergraduate scholarships for Central Americans are a good investment. Until then, I would encourage the U.S. Information Agency and the administration to work harder to support this program, and to work around the unnecessary restrictions included in the conference statement of managers. Those restrictions certainly are not the view of this Senator and those who originally sought the $9 million.

Mr. President, I would like to commend my distinguished colleague, Chairman HATFIELD, and my fellow members of the Appropriations Committee for bringing the fiscal year 1985 supplemental appropriations conference report to the Senate floor for final consideration before Congress adjourns for the August recess.

H.R. 2577 provides $13 billion in budget authority and $6.8 billion in outlays for a broad range of important Federal programs. Besides money for the traditional spring Federal pay supplemental, the conference report contains substantial funds for economic aid to Israel and Egypt, humanitarian aid for Nicaragua, student financial aid programs, the Food Stamp Program, and veterans compensation benefits.

The bill is within the Appropriations Committee's 302(a) allocation under the existing fiscal year 1985 budget resolution by $1.9 billion in budget authority and $0.8 billion in outlays—even considering outlays from prior-year budget authority and possible later requirements.

I would alert my colleagues to one provision of the conference agreement that could well result in higher Federal spending in the coming years. I am speaking of the provision that will fund an additional 210 NIH and ADAMHA extramural research grants in fiscal year 1985. While these are certainly important programs, I must point out that the number of grants now in the bill exceeds the total levels assumed in the Senate-passed budget resolution for fiscal year 1986 and each year through fiscal year 1988.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that tables showing the relationship of the reported bill, with possible later requirements taken into account, to the fiscal year 1985 budget resolution (H. Con. Res. 280) be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I rise today to support the amendment of my good friend and colleague, Senator HATFIELD, on the funding of water projects in the 1985 supplemental appropriations conference report.

The Senate's position on the funding of these water projects was clear: Cost-sharing agreements with local project users would have to be in place before the moneys in this supplemental appropriations bill could be released.

The House's amendment to the conference report adds a second criterion which must be met: Projects would have to be authorized. This criterion was clearly different than the Senate's position.

One of the 21 unauthorized projects funded in the Senate-passed supplemental appropriations bill is of vital concern to my State, the replacement of the Bonneville lock on the Columbia/Snake River System.

The existing Bonneville lock is woefully inadequate. It poses both serious hazards and long delays to river traffic in both directions. The average time-in-system to pass through the existing Bonneville lock is approximately 12.7 hours. Tethered barges must be separated and taken through the lock one at a time. The resulting bottleneck is particularly onerous because the Bonneville lock is the farthest downstream and is therefore the most heavily used lock on the entire system.

In 1982 I road a river tugboat, the Oregon, going downstream through the Bonneville lock. Tugboat operators have dubbed the east entrance to the lock "the gut." Entering it can be a harrowing experience, as evidenced by the many scars which have occurred when barge tows have collided with the lock.

Funding for the construction of a new lock at Bonneville is needed now. Improving the Bonneville lock will facilitate increased trade with the Pacific Rim. The capacity of the new lock will be adequate through the year 2040. The current lock can accommodate 13 million tons annually; the new lock 30 million tons. Further delay in funding will only result in increased costs and additional deterioration of the existing lock.

HELICOPTER FOR DRUG LAW ENFORCEMENT IN HAWAII

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I would like to call the attention of the distinguished chairman of our Commerce, Justice, State, the Judiciary, and Related Agencies Subcommittee, the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. LAXALT] to the portion of the statement of the managers regarding the funds we added for the Drug Enforcement Administration.

I note that the managers agreed to provide the full $20 million proposed by the Senate to enhance the Federal drug law enforcement effort. That enhancement was proposed by our chairman in close consultation with the Attorney General. When we considered that proposal in the Committee on Appropriations the only addition was to provide an additional $1,200,000 for an urgently needed helicopter for surveillance and eradication of illegal drugs in Hawaii.

Both the chairman, and the distinguished ranking minority member, the junior Senator from South Carolina

[Mr. HOLLINGS] have privately assured me that the conference agreement includes the $1,200,000 for the helicopter for Hawaii. However, the statement of the managers does not mention the helicopter, and I fear that the Department of Justice may be inclined to divert the $1,200,000 to something else.

Mr. LAXALT. Let me assure the distinguished Senator from Hawaii that the conference agreement definitely provides the $1,200,000 for the helicopter for Hawaii. When we met with the House managers, Senator HOLLINGS specifically asked if we agreed on the Hawaii helicopter, and the House managers affirmed that we had.

While we have provided for the funds to carry over into fiscal 1986, I would oppose any fooling around with the $1,200,000 for the helicopter. I would expect the DEA and the Department of Justice to expedite the procurement of the helicopter so it could be brought on line in the battle against illegal drug trafficking.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Let me also affirm that the conference agreement provides the full $1,200,000 for the helicopter. I commend the senior Senator from Hawaii for his efforts to secure this vital addition to the effort the Federal and local police forces are mounting in Hawaii. With all the Defense activities in Hawaii, there had been some thought that a helicopter could be obtained from one of the services. But I know that the Senator and his staff made a long and unsuccessful effort to secure one from the military. A year ago two staff members of the Committee on Appropriations reviewed the situation in Hawaii and clearly established the priority for this helicopter.

Let there be no false impressions, the conference agreement includes the $1,200,000 for the helicopter and I expect the DEA to get started with the procurement right away.

Mr. INOUYE. I appreciate having the assurances of the chairman and the ranking minority member, and their taking the time to complete the record on this item. As they indicated, this has been a long effort, and I did not want the Department to get any wrong ideas from the statement of the managers. I also want to thank them for all their help along the way.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, the conference report now before us and the bill which it accompanies, H.R. 2577, include urgently needed funds for several agencies under the jurisdiction of the Subcommittee on Agriculture, Rural Development, and Related Agencies. Many programs cannot be carried out, as required by law, if funds in this bill are not approved by the Congress and signed into law by the President.

The most urgently needed funding is for the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation [FCIC]. The FCIC has terminated the payment of claims and has notified its employees that they will be furloughed in 30 days if the funds provided in this supplemental, totaling $163 million, do not become available soon.

In addition, the conference agreement provides $2,935,790,000 for reimbursement for Commodity Credit Corporation [CCC] net realized losses. The original amount in both the House and Senate versions of the supplemental was $3,935,790,000. As you recall, however, we passed House Joint Resolution 342 almost 2 weeks ago. That emergency legislation provided $1 billion to continue the programs of the CCC while the supplemental was awaiting conference action. Although the CCC was able to resume operations, I am advised by the Secretary of Agriculture that that $1 billion will be exhausted the week of August 5—next week.

Another important item in the bill is $318,856,000 for the Food Stamp Program. Although this is not yet a critical need, these funds will be necessary to fund the program for the last few days of the fiscal year. This will ensure that benefits are not cut to food stamp recipients.

Funds are also included for various research projects, including the transfer of research now conducted at the Fort Stanton Experiment Station in New Mexico. This transfer will make available the land necessary for a new airport at Ruidoso. Other research items include funds for graduate fellowships, warm-water aquaculture, and remote sensing evaluation.

Under the conference agreement, $19 million is made available to partially fund the Grasshopper Control Program. The appropriated amount is to be used first, to reimburse APHIS accounts from which the Secretary of Agriculture borrowed funds; and second, to reimburse the Commodity Credit Corporation for a portion of the funding it has provided for the control program. Because the Secretary has declared the grasshopper outbreak an extraordinary emergency, CCC funds will continue to be available to carry out the control program.

For the Temporary Emergency Food Assistance Program [TEFAP], the conference report contains $7 million, to remain available until March 31, 1986. These funds are needed to assist States and local authorities with storage and distribution costs of providing surplus commodities to needy individuals.

Mr. President, other items are included in the conference agreement, including rescissions pursuant to the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 and additional pay costs for virtually every agency under our jurisdiction.

I believe this conference agreement represents a fair compromise and merits approval by the Congress and the President.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise to state my opposition to the action of the House in the matter of amendment No. 262 to this supplemental appropriations conference report. Amendment No. 262 has to do with the Senate provision providing funds to the Department of Transportation to enhance the development of passive restraints in our Nation's automobiles and to increase the use of seatbelts.

The House moved to strike the provision arrived at in conference to provide $4.5 million to DOT for this program. The Senate had approved $5.5 million for the program and conditioned the expenditure to try to bring some balance between the Department's advocacy of seatbelts and their position on passive restraints.

My colleagues might ask why the Senator from New Jersey would raise what might seem like an obscure provision. Let me inform my colleagues what I believe to be going on here.

Last year, when the Senate was considering the continuing resolution, the Senator from Missouri, Senator DANFORTH and I offered an amendment to provide funding for a balanced program within the Department of Transportation to enhance the use of seatbelts and the development of airbags and other passive restraints. We were assured that the program would be balanced and not just a supplement to the $20 million campaign of the auto industry to pass mandatory seatbelt laws in the States and, in the process, under the rule issued by Secretary Dole, rescind the requirement that airbags be provided in 1987 model cars.

The Senator from North Dakota, Senator ANDREWS, the able chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee, conditioned an appropriation requiring that the Department provide a plan as to how they would spend the funds. The plan was supposed to be in keeping with the balance between seatbelts and passive restraints called for by the Senate. The plans submitted, belatedly by the Department, were deemed to be inadequate.

The Department asked for $20 million for fiscal year 1985. Under the continuing resolution, it was given $2.5 million. In the supplemental, the House committee provided no additional funding. The Senate provided $5.5 million but stipulated that $3 million would go to passive restraints. These funds would be used to bring low-cost airbags systems into the marketplace.

In fact, Mr. President, the Supreme Court in its decision mandating that the airbag be considered by DOT as a safety device said that the auto industry had engaged in the regulatory version of war on the airbag for years. So, even this tiny amount of funding weighted against the millions spent by the auto industry is rejected by the House.

If you want an airbag in your car, you can get one, but you'll have to buy a Mercedes. They'll have airbags. But if you're an American of modest means, who buys the auto industry's Buy America campaign, then you're out of luck.

Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from North Dakota what he considers an appropriate response to this objectionable action by the House.

Mr. ANDREWS. My colleague from New Jersey has strong views about this matter. I can appreciate his frustration. This is a small amount of money when compared to the administration's request. The committee was trying to bring some balance to this program and to make the point that States should have a valid idea of what they were voting on before they considered mandatory seatbelt laws.

I cannot see holding up this vital legislation on this point. We have 60 days left in the fiscal year. We will have a 1986 fiscal year appropriations bill before the Senate in September. I would suggest to the Senator that we revisit this issue in that context. I am certainly prepared to work with him on this issue.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. I thank the Senator. Under the circumstances, I reluctantly accept his advice. I look forward to working with him to resolve this matter in September.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, there are a few comments I wish to make before the Senate finally adopts the conference report to the fiscal year 1985 supplemental appropriations bill. There are at least three items contained in this bill that I wanted to draw to the attention of my colleagues.

I am deeply upset that funding for the State Grants for Dependent Care Planning and Development Program was dropped by the conference committee. The Human Services Reauthorization Act—in which the State grants for dependent care was authorized—was passed so late in the 98th Congress, that there was insufficient time to secure the needed appropriations for this new program. Now a whole fiscal year will have passed for which this program was authorized and no funds were appropriated. It is extremely unfortunate that we are letting this opportunity pass without funding this small yet significant effort to address the vital child care needs of millions of parents and school age children. The reason given by the House conferees for taking this action was the short time left in the current fiscal year for issuing regulations and getting this program underway. Clearly this line of reasoning would not apply to fiscal year 1986. Therefore, I will continue my efforts to secure funding for this program in the regular fiscal year 1986 appropriations bill.

Mr. President, I am pleased however that this supplemental appropriations conference report retained the $5 million to fund the Federal Children's Trust Fund Challenge Grant Program authorized last Congress. This new grant program challenges States to establish special trust funds to finance child abuse prevention activities, by authorizing 25 percent Federal matching funds or $0.50 times the number of children in the State.

My own State is a leader in the field, having been one of the first States to establish a trust fund in 1982. Last year, by means of a $2 per taxpayer voluntary State income tax refund checkoff, $650,000 was raised for child abuse prevention activities. And now, with this additional appropriation, Michigan will be able to double her efforts in the critical fight against child abuse.

Mr. President, on a different subject, I am disappointed that this supplemental conference report continues our unwise policy of seeking to affect change in Central America by providing additional funding for the Contras in Nicaragua. For the reasons which I outlined earlier during Senate floor debate, I believe U.S. national security interests would best be served by a Central American policy which emphasizes nonmilitary, diplomatic solutions to the problems of the region. To that end, the United States should abandon its Contra policy, putting its energies instead behind the peace efforts of the Contadora nations, which seek to address the region's conflicts through serious negotiations. By actively supporting the Contadora peace process, I believe the United States could play an important role in both promoting regional stability and enhancing important U.S. national security interests.

One additional foreign policy issue addressed by this supplemental conference report is the $250 million in emergency economic assistance it contains for Jordan. I appreciate the fact that Jordan is facing difficult economic times, and share the hope that, by helping address that crisis through economic aid, the United States can nudge Jordan toward playing a more active role in the peace process.

My concern, which I express at length during Senate floor debate, is that receipt of this aid not prompt Jordan to increase its level of military spending with funds which would otherwise be required to address its economic needs.

In light of the absence of explicit Jordanian assurances on this point, I want the RECORD to show that it is the will of this Senator that provision of this emergency economic aid not result in further military spending by Jordan.

Mr. President, finally, I would like to mention that the conference report reiterates Congress' commitment to keep the Coast Guard at full force on the Great Lakes. In the 1986 budget proposal, the administration proposed the elimination or downgrading of 13 Coast Guard stations on the Great Lakes. This proposal is ill-advised, potentially dangerous, and has aroused tremendous opposition in many communities throughout the Great Lakes region. I am pleased this 1985 supplemental appropriations bills recognizes that the budget proposal should be examined very carefully prior to any actions being taken to close the Coast Guard stations. By prohibiting any expenditures for closure activities, the Congress will have sufficient time to investigate all aspects of this issue, and I am confident that upon examination, we will conclude that the continued operation of the Coast Guard stations is essential to the safety and the protection of lives on the Great Lakes.

TANGIER ISLAND

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, I want to commend the chairman of the Appropriations Committee for his diligent work and leadership on this fiscal year 1985 supplemental appropriations bill. I regret the House's precipitous action last evening regarding the water projects language and I hope that the current impasse can be quickly resolved.

The four Virginia water projects included in the conference bill continue to be of great importance to the Commonwealth. Canal No. 2 and the hurricane protection project are designed to protect valuable inland and shoreline properties in the area of Virginia Beach area. The Richmond downtown floodwall protection plan is of vital importance to the city's commercial area.

Of course, the deepening of the Port of Hampton Roads is of great significance for not only the Commonwealth, but for the entire east coast.

Mr. President, I would like to clarify one point.

The House version of the bill provided $150,000 so that the U.S. Corps of Engineers could update project design and cost estimates in order that construction can begin at the earliest possible time at Tangier Island in the Chesapeake Bay. It's my understanding that this funding was not affected by last evening's floor action.

The chairman knows of Tangier Island's historic significance. An 8,200-foot seawall is desperately needed to check erosion of the shorefront adjacent to the airstrip at the northern tip of the island. The airstrip is the islanders' only link with the mainland during the winter. Without the airstrip the island will eventually have to be evacuated.

Authorization for construction of such a seawall is contained in both House and Senate versions of the water projects bill. Additionally, the Appropriations Committee has, in past years, included instructions to the Corps of Engineers to use available funds to update the seawall construction engineering and design work so that construction can begin immediately upon authorization. I believe the Senate clearly supports the Tangier Island seawall project.

Am I correct in understanding that, since the Senate conferees did not specifically disagree with the House-provided $150,000 for the Tangier seawall design, I should assume that these funds will be provided in fiscal year 1985?

Mr. HATFIELD. The Senator from Virginia is correct in his understanding regarding the funds provided in fiscal year 1985 for the Tangier Island seawall study update. The intent of the committee has been clear and is indicated by report language provided in the regular fiscal year 1985 appropriation bill. We recognize the historic and cultural significance of Tangier Island and believe that the update of the engineering and design plans for the seawall should be readied as soon as possible.

Mr. TRIBLE. I thank the gentleman from Oregon, chairman of the committee.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I rise to associate myself with the remarks of my Virginia colleague, Senator TRIBLE, on the cultural and historic significance of Tangier Island and with the need for the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers to use the necessary funds to update the engineering and design study for the Tangier floodwall.

WATER PROJECTS—APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I wish to state my support for the House language that requires passage of a water resources authorization bill with cost-sharing reforms before any money from this bill can be spent to initiate new water projects.

This is an important provision; the Senate should support it.

The Committee on Environment and Public Works will this week file our omnibus water resources development bill, together with its report. The bill will then go to the Committee on Finance for its review of the bill's tax provisions.

The floor colloquy many of us had with the majority leader in June demonstrates that the Committee on Finance will move quickly to report its amendments, if any.

It would be my hope that the majority leader will then schedule early floor action on the entire bill.

I will be ready to move on this bill as soon as we return in September. My committee will be ready to move.

Unfortunately, this cannot be guaranteed. Therefore, I see the House language as a valuable tool to keep the pressure on the Congress.

We need to get a water resources bill. The assurance that new projects are linked to such a bill is worthy of our support.

I believe the further amendment offered by the floor manager, setting the May 15 date, is a sound compromise. I commend him, and urge that he join with me in making certain we get the water bill to the floor as soon as possible.

REPORT LANGUAGE ON INTERNATIONAL TELECOMMUNICATIONS SATELLITE SERVICE

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I had no intention of offering a statement on the report language the conferees agreed upon in regard to international telecommunications satellite service, since I believed the language was clear on its face. I still believe the language is clear, however, the House manager inserted a statement in yesterday's House debate that tries to reinterpret this language. This statement of the House manager obviously reflects his opinions alone and not those agreed upon in the conference. The various executive branch and independent agencies directed to act in the report language shall follow the plain meaning of that language.

More specifically, let me make the following points in response to the House manager's statement:

First. The managers reached no conclusion that the decision of the FCC last week did not fully enforce the conditions in Presidential Determination 85-2.

Second. The managers did not conclude that Intelsat does not today have the ability to price flexibly.

Third. The managers only agreed to support Intelsat's ability to compete fully and fairly in all new international telecommunications satellite services. The managers did not conclude, as the House manager asserts, that this support extends to any service—old or new—for which competitive challenges to its—Intelsat's—provision of services appear.

Fourth. In conditioning the support of the United States to a modification of article 5(d) of the Intelsat Agreement, the managers agreed that Intelsat had to have in place measures to ensure prices are cost-based and not predatory, including the release of information on revenues, costs, and the allocation of costs. The managers in no way agreed that Intelsat already had those measures in place. In fact, if we believed that Intelsat already had such measures in place, why did we even refer to Intelsat having to adopt such measures and release such information? It is clear that the managers believed just the contrary to the House manager's statement. Intelsat does not now have such measures in place. The type of information Intelsat releases is not sufficient for the United States to determine that prices are not predatory. The President and the executive branch are to make sure these measures are adopted prior to any support for a modification to article 5(d).

Fifth. The managers believe the current Presidential determination is properly balanced. There was no determination by the managers that the conditions in this determination are so "absolute and fundamental" that they can never be altered. What the managers agreed to is that prior to any change the President must submit the tentative decision to Congress for 45 days review.

As I stated at the outset, the report language is clear on its face, and the comments of the House manager are his alone.

GALLIPOLIS LOCKS AND DAM

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senate version of this supplemental appropriations bill, H.R. 2577, contained authorization for 25 new water projects, including the Gallipolis locks and dam on the Ohio River. These same projects were previously included in the Senate-passed version of the fiscal year 1985 continuing resolution, House Joint Resolution 648. Unfortunately, the authorization for these projects was dropped in conference with the House last fall; and, again yesterday, the House voted to withhold construction of Gallipolis and some 40 other new projects approved by the conferees on H.R. 2577, pending congressional passage of an omnibus water projects authorization bill.

Mr. President, there continues to be a pressing need for the reconstruction of the Gallipolis locks and dam. This is not a project with marginal benefits. The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has determined that the replacement project has an 11.3-to-1 benefit-to-cost ratio. Furthermore, the corps indicated to me during appropriation hearings on February 20, 1985, that the new locks would produce an average of $173 million in benefits every year. These annual benefits greatly outweigh the one-time estimated project cost of $370 million. The Gallipolis project is presently the only facility on a 900-mile stretch of the Ohio River that does not have a main lock chamber measuring at least 1,200 feet in length. The existing lock chambers at Gallipolis are only one-half the size of the modern locks on the river. Consequently, barge operators must disassemble their larger tows and push smaller segments through these inefficient locks. Gallipolis continues to be a bottleneck which wastes time and money for Ohio River commerce.

Gallipolis locks, while inefficient, are exceptionally busy with 4,042 commercial trips carrying 37 million tons of products through the facility last year alone. The Corps of Engineers predicts that, by 1990, 64.5 million tons of commerce will be transported through the existing locks with an average delay of approximately 30 hours per tow. So, Mr. President, the existing locks are becoming an intolerable impediment for waterborne commerce on the entire Ohio River navigation system.

The existing locks are not only inefficient, they are extremely dangerous. Their location on a bend in the river, where strong currents exist, make a tow operator's job extremely difficult and hazardous. The Gallipolis reconstruction project, consisting of two new locks, one 1,200 feet by 110 feet, and one 600 feet by 110, would be located in a channel on the West Virginia side of the Ohio River, bypassing the existing lock chambers. In addition to the inherent efficiency of these larger locks, the new design would slice off a portion of the bend in the river thereby straightening out the approach taken by river tow operators. This is an important safety feature of the new facility.

Mr. President, there is some consolation that the conference agreement on this supplemental appropriations bill contains a limited authorization, as well as $4.5 million for land acquisition and continued planning and design of the Gallipolis project so that some progress can be made at Gallipolis. I am hopeful, however, that Senator HATFIELD's amendment, which I cosponsored, will be accepted when the Senate returns this conference report to the House for further action. Our amendment would effectively authorize Gallipolis, and 20 other projects, on May 15, if no omnibus water projects authorization bill has been signed into law prior to that time. Mr. President, recognizing the urgent safety and financial considerations calling for the replacement of the Gallipolis locks, I hope that the House will accept this latest compromise offering by the Senate this afternoon. If they do not, the people of West Virginia can be assured that I will do all in my power to see that the Gallipolis locks and dam are authorized on the next appropriate legislative vehicle.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I believe that the parliamentary situation now would call for me to urge the adoption of the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I do now, therefore, urge the adoption of the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HATFIELD. I believe now we have before us the 60-some amendments that will either be adopted en bloc or one by one. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Technically after the first amendment in disagreement is reported, it would take unanimous consent to dispose of the amendments en bloc.

Mr. HATFIELD. I understand.

Mr. President, I propose now to propound a unanimous-consent agreement that the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate in disagreement be considered and agreed to en bloc with the exception of amendments numbered 112 and 262.

Let me say what those two numbers are. The No. 112 is the water projects amendment. Amendment 262 has to do with seatbelt appropriations, that we will have to have a separate one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The amendments in disagreement agreed to en bloc are as follows:

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2 to the aforesaid bill, and concur therein with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert:

Each such agreement shall include a statement that the non-Federal entities are capable of and willing to participate in project cost-sharing and financing in accordance with terms of the agreement. At such time as the Secretary has executed a formal binding agreement and has determined that the non-Federal entities' financing plan demonstrates a reasonable likelihood of the non-Federal entities' ability to satisfy the terms and conditions of the agreement, the Secretary shall initiate construction at a project in accordance with such agreement: Provided further, That the funds appropriated herein shall lapse on June 30, 1986, if the agreement required herein for that project has not been executed: Provided further, That where construction of a comprehensive project for flood control and improvement of a multi-State region described in this paragraph has commenced prior to the date of enactment of this Act, new or additional non-Federal cost-sharing shall not be required for any part of such comprehensive project, and where construction of such a project has begun prior to the date of enactment of this Act, all elements or features of the comprehensive project shall be considered to be part of that project: Provided further, That the initiation of inland waterways projects identified for planning, design, engineering, and construction in this Act may be funded from sums available in the Inland Waterways Trust Fund, established by the Inland Waterways Revenue Act of 1978 (title II of Public Law 95-502) notwithstanding the second sentence of section 204 of such Act. Notwithstanding any other provision of law (including any other provision of this Act), initiation of construction with respect to any project referred to in this paragraph shall be subject to subsequent enactment of legislation specifying the requirements of local cooperation for water resources development projects under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Army and where appropriate, to enactment of needed authorizing legislation.

AMENDMENT NO. 574

(Purpose: To further amend Amendment No. 112)

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I call up that amendment and ask No. 112 be reported with a further amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. HATFIELD] proposes an amendment numbered 574 to amendment in disagreement 112.

After the word "legislation" at the end of the last sentence, add the following: "; except that this sentence shall not apply after May 15, 1986."

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I move to concur in amendment No. 112 with the further amendment that has just been read and I have explained exactly what the amendment does. It provides a reasonable period of time for the authorizing committees to come forth to resolve the question of the unauthorized projects, but if they fail to do that by May 15, then the provisions of the original conference report would take effect.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, my understanding is it has been cleared with the leadership on the minority side, and there is no objection.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. MATHIAS. Will the manager of the bill tell us what is the impact on the projects that are already authorized?

Mr. HATFIELD. I was saying a little bit earlier to the Senator from Maryland that is somewhat debatable. What the intent of the House was as a verbally presented amendment in the session of the House yesterday was to provide an amendment that would separate out the unauthorized from the authorized projects and provide only for the authority to move ahead with the authorized projects but to lock out any opportunity to proceed with the unauthorized projects with or without cost sharing.

As we now reread that amendment in written, printed form, there is some question as to whether or not that amendment did precisely what it was intended to or whether now it can be interpreted to incorporate all projects in the supplemental, both authorized and unauthorized projects.

I would give to the Senator the wording of that amendment to illustrate my point.

It is the top section.

To be more specific, if I could, the Maryland projects are authorized but we are now looking at this language that would prohibit the Maryland projects from moving ahead even though they are authorized.

Mr. MATHIAS. Because the key words that the Senator is looking at are, "initiation of construction."

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is right.

Mr. HATFIELD. Yes, that is right on any projects.

Mr. MATHIAS. Except that this shall not apply after April 15.

Mr. HATFIELD. This has been changed to May 15.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, I support the amendment that has been written by Mr. HATFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that my name may be added as a cosponsor of that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senate version of this supplemental appropriations bill, H.R. 2577, contained authorization for 25 new water projects, including the Gallipolis locks and dam on the Ohio River. These same projects were previously included in the Senate-passed version of the fiscal year 1985 continuing resolution, House Joint Resolution 648. Unfortunately, the authorization for these projects was dropped in conference with the House last fall; and, again yesterday, the House voted to withhold construction of Gallipolis and some 40 other new projects approved by the conference on H.R. 2577, pending congressional passage of an omnibus water projects authorization bill.

Mr. President, there continues to be a pressing need for the reconstruction of the Gallipolis locks and dam. This is not a project with marginal benefits. The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has determined that the replacement project has an 11.3 to 1 benefit-to-cost ratio. Furthermore, the corps indicated to me during appropriations hearings on February 20, 1985, that the new locks would produce an average of $173 million in benefits every year. These annual benefits greatly outweigh the one-time estimated project cost of $370 million. The Gallipolis project is presently the only facility on a 900-mile stretch of the Ohio River that does not have a main lock chamber measuring at least 1,200 feet in length. The existing lock chambers at Gallipolis are only one-half the size of the modern locks on the river. Consequently, barge operators must disassemble their larger tows and push smaller segments through these inefficient locks. Gallipolis continues to be a bottleneck which wastes time and money for Ohio River commerce.

Gallipolis locks, while inefficient, are exceptionally busy with 4,042 commercial trips carrying 37 million tons of products through the facility last year alone. The Corps of Engineers predicts that, by 1990, 64.5 million tons of commerce will be transported through the existing locks with an average delay of approximately 30 hours per tow. So, Mr. President, the existing locks are becoming an intolerable impediment for waterborne commerce on the entire Ohio River navigation system.

The existing locks are not only inefficient; they are also extremely dangerous. Their location on a bend in the river, where strong currents exist, makes a tow operator's job extremely difficult and hazardous. The Gallipolis reconstruction project, consisting of two new locks, one 1,200 feet by 110 feet, and one 600 feet by 110, would be located in a channel on the West Virginia side of the Ohio River, bypassing the existing lock chambers. In addition to the inherent efficiency of these larger locks, the new design would slice off a portion of the bend in the river, thereby straightening out the approach taken by river tow operators. This is an important safety feature of the new facility.

Mr. President, there is some consolation that the conference agreement on this supplemental appropriations bill contains a limited authorization, as well as $4.5 million for land acquisition and continued planning and design of the Gallipolis project so that some progress can be made at Gallipolis. I am hopeful, however, that Senator HATFIELD's amendment, which I cosponsored, will be accepted when the Senate returns this conference report to the House for further action. Our amendment would effectively authorize Gallipolis, and 20 other projects, on May 15, 1986, if no omnibus water projects authorization bill has been signed into law prior to that time. Mr. President, recognizing the urgent saftey and financial considerations calling for the replacement of the Gallipolis locks, I hope that the House will accept this latest compromise offering by the Senate this afternoon. If the House does not, the people of West Virginia can be assured that I will do all I can to see that the Gallipolis locks and dam are authorized on the next appropriate legislative vehicle.

Mr. HATFIELD. I thank the Democratic leader. He has certainly been a stalwart leader on this.

I believe I have a motion pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. HATFIELD].

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

EXCEPTED AMENDMENT NO. 262

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate recede on amendment No. 262, which is the seat belt amendment. Let me explain that a little bit. We want to go back to the basic agreement on the committee, so we would recede to the House language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. HATFIELD].

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. HATFIELD. I thank the Chair.

APPOINTMENT BY THE VICE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUMPHREY). The Chair, on behalf of the Vice President, pursuant to section 276 of title 22, United States Code, as amended, appoints the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. SIMPSON] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ZORINSKY] as members of the Senate delegation to the Interparliamentary Union Conference to be held in Ottawa, Canada, on September 2-7, 1985.

DAVID STOCKMAN

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I would comment briefly to note the resignation of David Stockman, as Director of the Office of Management and Budget, becomes effective today. There is a reception for Mr. Stockman in the majority leader's office. I urge our colleagues to drop by and pay their regards to Mr. Stockman, or pay anything they wish in tribute to him or express at least their feelings. He is a very interesting man. I have come to know him. I have worked with him. He is an extraordinary person. I have never in my public life as a legislator met anyone who knew "the numbers" any better than David Stockman. He is truly a remarkable man.

The resignation of David Stockman as Director of the Office of Management and Budget will become effective today. In 4½ years in this most difficult and demanding position, David Stockman has displayed an absolute mastery of the Federal budget process second to none. Along with our fine President, he has changed the face of the Office of Management and Budget from a rather obscure entity into a very real force to be reckoned with in every area of Federal policy. He has grappled with the multitude of "the numbers" in the most professional and forthright manner possible—and by friend or foe, he is respected for that.

He is a dazzlingly bright fellow—and he will continue to dazzle and impress wherever he goes. He is a first-class act in any entourage. Dave will do well. He will even make a bit more out in public life than he could by further serving his Government. In fact, he may even make as much as most third basemen on many major league ball clubs! And why not? For he can handle the "hot corner" better than any man I have ever seen.

I want to wish David Stockman the very best in all his future endeavors. He and his lovely wife, Jennifer, deserve a time of respite and release from the hectic Washington scene. They can now, with their delightful daughter, Rachel, turn their attention toward what can only promise to be a most rewarding future—individually and as a family.

Dave leaves this arena a much better place for his having been here. I want to acknowledge and thank him for the great patience and consummate skill that he has displayed with me personally and with many of my colleagues as we have discussed, debated, cussed, and negotiated over these past years. I shall miss him greatly.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUMPHREY). Under the previous order, the hours between 1 and 3 o'clock are set aside for discussing of the pending options before the Agriculture Committee.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, it is my understanding we will start the discussion of a number of farm options here in just a few moments. I wish to thank the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Senator HATFIELD, and the distinguished ranking member, Senator PROXMIRE, for their expeditious handling of the supplemental appropriations conference report. Thank you very much. We appreciate it.

After discussion of the different farm programs, it would be my hope that we might be in a position to take up the budget resolution. I have not conferred with the chairman of the Budget Committee. I know they are in conference now. It is my hope the Senate will act first on the budget resolution. We will have more to say on that later.

Then, it is my understanding that the distinguished Senator from Oregon would still like to take up the energy and water appropriations bill today. If we can either have a time agreement or some indication that would not take a great deal of time, we could dispose of that early, by 6 or 7 o'clock. That would leave only a couple of items. I understand we will not be able to complete either the South Africa conference report this week or the farm bill or the Genocide Treaty. I hope that, if that is a fact, as I understand it probably is, then we would call up the South Africa conference report, file cloture, and have a vote occur when we return from the August recess.

It is still my hope that we might complete action on all matters today. We have done rather well, I believe, in cleaning up the calendar and passing a number of legislative proposals. I urge my colleagues who are concerned about agriculture that there is an opportunity now that we can devote a couple of hours to discussing the cost of the program. One area that will be of interest is the final number that the Budget Committees agree on in their conference. That will be discussed as soon as that information is available.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FARM PROGRAMS

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, the situation on the farm bill in the Agriculture Committee is this:

Work on almost all the commodity title of the bill has been completed. When we last met yesterday morning, the pending motion was one that I made to have all of the coming 4 years or whatever the life of the bill is, to protect the current target prices where they are now. I am not asking that they be increased, but that they be held at the present level.

The committee had adopted previously a two-tiered system on target prices for wheat. By that, I mean the first 20,000 bushels of wheat produced by a farmer would receive a higher target price, $4.55 per bushel, and a lower target price of $4 per bushel for the next 40,000 bushels of wheat.

At that two-tier level, it comes out to about the same amount of dollars and deficiency payments as if we held it with no tier at $4.38 per bushel, which is the current target price.

If the committee does meet again—I believe we are scheduled to meet at 3 o'clock this afternoon—we will then proceed, I believe, to vote on the pending motion. That motion would leave the target prices at the same level, but would authorize discretion for the Secretary of Agriculture if he wanted to pay, in the 2 last years, 5 percent of the deficiency payment in commodities. The reason for that, Mr. President, is simply to avoid some of the budget impact connected with target prices and deficiency payments that are derived from those target prices.

The farmers and ranchers of this country want to know three key parts of this proposed new farm bill. First, they want to know about prices. They want to know what the prices of commodities are likely to be during the coming years. On most commodities, agricultural producers are suffering from very low prices, whether it is grain or soybeans or cotton or rice or cattle or hogs.

The prices are low and farmers and ranchers are in desperate straits in many instances because they have been selling their production for several years in a row at a loss. This eventually gets to your bank account. It gets to you on how much money you have borrowed to stay in operation during losing years.

There is another factor involved also. Land values in most agricultural States have dropped rather drastically. I really do not know of any agricultural State where land values have not dropped. The Department of Agriculture publishes every year a report on the current situation regarding land values. In the report in April of this year, which covered the previous 12 months—that is, the period between April 1984 and April 1985—their statistics showed the average drop in land owned by farmers and ranchers to be 12 percent during that 12-month period—a 12-percent drop nationwide average. If you look at my own State, Montana, it dropped a few percentage points more than that in that period of time.

Even more alarming was that six States in the Farm Belt—the two Dakotas, Iowa, Minnesota, Illinois, and Nebraska—had dropped an average, during that 12-month period, of 25 percent in land value.

Let me tell you this, Mr. President: That land value dropping that drastically in that year—that 12-month period—which, of course, followed drops in the preceding 12-month period and the 12-month period before that—that sort of decrease in land values is extremely catching; it is contagious. Even though Montana did not drop that much, do not think for a minute that I am not really scared for Montana, because it is all relative. We will see our land values sag further.

We are not in great shape in land values in Montana, but we have not had as drastic a drop over the last several years as many other States, particularly in the Corn Belt, have experienced.

What does all that mean to farmers and ranchers? It means a whole lot because more than half of agricultural land has a debt on it. As those values decline, the people holding the paper, the mortgages, get more itchy. And there is less collateral for those operators to show to their lending agencies, whether those agencies be commercial banks or the PCA's in farm credit system or the Farmers Home Administration of the Department of Agriculture. When farmers show their balance sheet, it gets worse and worse.

That certainly answers anybody who is wondering what is the major concern of farmers and ranchers about the situation and about the farm bill and about the economy of the United States: What is the price they are going to receive for their commodity? That is the No. 1 concern.

A farm bill is not meant to set everybody's prices. What we have had in the past in farm programs has not always been successful. Many people say, "Well, quit tinkering with it. Why should Congress be involved in it as much as they are? Obviously, it is a failure; why don't you get out of it? That, Mr. President, is an extremely fair and good question.

The answer is simply this: At this stage, with these commodity prices at the level they are, we could not conceivably think of getting out of it. There has to be a new farm bill and it has to protect the safety net features in the farm bill for the various commodities which are depending upon it. These are the grains, whether it is wheat or feed grains, cotton, rice, and soybeans. Those are the principal crops in the commodity program.

I could mention others: the sugar program, the wool program, the dairy program. In all instances, what we strive for and hope to succeed in our final efforts is that the farm bill will not remove the safety net, will not alter those safety features that are built into the underpinning of the agricultural commodities for the next 4 years or whatever the life of the bill will be.

With regard to what the prices are going to be, they are not going to be improving very much. We hope to hold the safety net there so that we can keep as many of these operators in business as possible for a brighter day. We do not want to lose them.

So we come to a point where people say, well, what does the bill do on moving more of the commodities abroad? This is the so-called market-oriented policy. The market-oriented policy, if my colleagues can follow me for a moment or two, is the theory that if the price can be allowed to float on the open market, perhaps we will sell more of our commodities abroad and, by selling more of our commodities abroad, eventually the prices will stabilize and, we hope, will start to come up.

The Department of Agriculture advocates this type of approach in this farm bill. A big majority of the committee is supporting that. There will be questions of course on how you "rig" this. I do not think I am misusing the term when I say "rig" because you actually set the market clearance price at where we believe we will export so many billion bushels of wheat or so many million bushels of soybeans, corn, and sorghum or get rid of so many bales of cotton or so many hundredweights of rice. Frankly, it is conjecture on the part of the Department of Agriculture economists in trying to arrive at that clearance price. I do not want to be too harsh on those economists in the Department of Agriculture because, as a matter of fact, what they are being asked to do is to give us their best judgment. Their best judgment in some instances is right. I wish it were right more often than it is wrong, but to be honest about it they are more often wrong than they are right.

Harry Truman, once said, that what he really needed was a one-armed economist because every economist he dealt with said, "On the one hand, it is this way and, on the other hand, it is that way," and he wanted a one-armed man so, whatever it was, it would be this way; there would not be two different choices.

Economics is not a science where you can just say X plus Y equals something. Economics looks at different sets of factors and tries to evaluate what could conceivably happen. But they are giving us their best judgment. They are saying that these market clearance prices are going to be very low for the 1986 crop, they will even get a little bit lower in the 1987 crop and perhaps start to stabilize in the 1988 crops or the 1989 crops and maybe even show a little improvement.

While I believe we have to concede that some type of market-oriented policy is absolutely necessary now, I do not believe we want to see that price drop down to zero.

There is a second key factor about which the farmers and ranchers need to know. When I say that, I mean all of the rural communities, I mean all of rural America, whether it is our lenders or bankers or PCA's or the John Deere dealers or other implement companies, or whether it is the doctors and the dentists and the beauty shops and the bakers, or whatever, in these small communities, or whether it is the school boards, the churches, or retired people living in these towns. They need to know what is going to keep rural America alive. We have to speak to them about exports.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. MELCHER. Yes; I will be delighted to yield to my colleague from North Dakota.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I appreciate the senior Senator from Montana yielding. What he is saying is precisely correct. Face it, Mr. President, none of us in this Chamber, none of the best economists in this country know from our crystal balls what the next year holds. But we do know what the situation is today. We need a new concept, a farm bill that is market oriented. My colleague, the senior Senator from Montana, has pointed out how we intend to write such a bill but, at the same time, Mr. President, we need a safety net for farmers, and a safety net which is a freeze is not asking too much.

Today's major credit crisis in agriculture is in long-term loans. Federal Land Banks all over this country are in a tough way. The long-term lenders, banks and insurance companies alike are wondering about the value of these loans. We have spent many hours, Mr. President, as the Senator from Montana knows so well because he has been in those meetings, trying to work out ways to make individual farm operations cash flow. You have difficulty making them cash flow on a level playing field, Mr. President, you cannot make them cash flow if income is decreasing 5 percent in each one of those out years. It is important to note also that a 5-percent cut in gross represents about a 25-percent cut in net, and that is tragic.

It is tragic for the family farmer, for the Nation's consumers, for the American economy and for our trade deficit.

It is an unconscionable and unthinkable situation

Many of us in this Chamber on both sides of the aisle feel that the way to get our runaway deficits under control is to write a budget act that would freeze spending across the board, and that, Mr. President, incidentally, could well be the best farm bill we could write because those deficits are killing us with high interest rates. The agriculture sector feels the impact of high interest rates probably more than any other sector. The increased value of the dollar necessary to bring in overseas investments to cover our own deficit, which we are not willing to finance ourselves, means that we had to attract $83 billion in foreign investments that has cost us dearly in agricultural exports. But when we were talking about how to deal with the deficit, so important to agriculture, we were saying the fairest way would be an across-the-board freeze, a freeze, Mr. President, and a freeze was thought to be fair and is fair.

Some of us were willing to vote a freeze on the Defense Department, a freeze on COLA's—it took a little courage to do that—a freeze in agriculture, yes, a freeze in transportation. That is the way, Mr. President, we felt we could get the deficits under control. Some of us were even willing to vote for revenue enhancement, our political word for taxes, because we felt it was important to get the deficit down. But, Mr. President, let me say the freeze has not worked in the case of COLA's. It was not acceptable. The freeze has not worked in the case of defense. The bloated defense contractors have continued to up their take. And now we cannot even maintain a freeze in agriculture. They are telling us we have to decrease that segment, the very segment of our economy that is in the most trouble today.

Mr. President, it simply does not make sense. We need a level playing field for our farm families. We need to have a system of support that allows them to have that safety net while we move toward a new era in farm programs that will be market oriented, that will be competitive, that will take away the protective umbrella from the Canadians and the Argentines and the Australians who have been benefiting from our irrational farm policies of the past.

I salute my colleague and good friend for the very significant effort he is making toward that end. I will continue to support him in what he is trying to do because I think it is right not just for farmers in this country but for the entire economy of our country.

In fact, Mr. President, let me conclude by saying we ought to quit talking about the farm problem and start talking about the agricultural opportunity. We ought to begin to realize in our own country that the Soviets can blow this world up 10 times over and so can we. They can put a man in space and so can we. But they cannot feed their own people, much less troubled people in the other parts of this world. We can.

That is the true strength of our country. We ought to be saying we are proud of it and we are going to use it to show the way and share our bounty with other less fortunate members of the world community of nations. This is the American system at its best, at producing, at marketing, at benefiting mankind. So we should stop talking about the farm problem and begin looking at the agricultural opportunity and move ahead.

I salute my colleague from Montana for the great work he is doing in this cause and thank him for yielding.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank my friend from North Dakota. One thing about North Dakota, they always send people to the Senate that know agriculture, and that is a tribute to the people of North Dakota.

I commend my long-time friend. He has been in Congress much longer than I, and I commend him for his leadership at all times, both in the House and in the Senate, in making certain that we have some recognition and some understanding of the agricultural problems and agricultural matters in Congress.

When we talk about what this country is about in producing all this food, it is obvious that we have to export a lot of it. But that is nothing new.

When the country started out long ago, Thomas Jefferson conceived the idea that the greatest asset for the United States was its great agricultural capability and its ability to outproduce other areas and to provide various parts of the world with needed commodities. He was absolutely right. Things have not changed.

Farmers have become very good in producing; ranchers have become very good in their endeavors in livestock. We find that we consistently and continuously outproduce our own needs. That is not a mistake or some sort of fault or some sort of failure. That is huge success. That is what this country is about.

We are a country that exports agricultural commodities; and when we fail to take advantage of the great abundance of agricultural commodities that we have available over our own needs and make sure that they can be utilized throughout the world, we are failing in the most significant peacetime policy this country could have.

I believe it is far better to use the abundance of food we have to increase our influence around the world in peaceful ways. That is for better than concocting these wild schemes we always seem to be having on how more armaments can be sold by the United States or can be given away by the United States. Assuredly, we do it for our allies. Do not get me wrong. We are not trying to give or sell arms to people who are not our friends. We do it as a national defense goal.

I point out that a continuing problem is still hunger and malnutrition throughout the world. For those countries with which we have friendly dealings, we should make sure that, through our export mechanisms, we are there with the commodities they need in order to satisfy that hunger and that malnourishment.

There are three types of main exports, in my judgment.

One is regular sales for cash—to Russia, to Taiwan, to Japan, and to other countries. Cash on the barrelhead is one type.

Then there are concessionary sales, when we give terms and conditions. They need some interest; they need a longer period of time to pay, and we sell it on concessionary sales.

Also, there are donations of food.

These three categories have been down for the last several years, and that is one of the reasons why we are having desperate times with prices. All three categories should be improved, whether it is cash sales, meeting the competition, and whatever we have to do to get the cash sales; whether we have to go the extra mile in concessionary sales to countries such as Mexico and the Philippines or other developing countries; or whether we are meeting all the opportunties for donations where it is logical, reasonable, and mutually beneficial for the other countries and ourselves to do so. We are not meeting those needs, and that is why the agricultural imports of this country have been declining during the last 2 or 3 years. We should correct that, and it is our hope that in the export title of this bill we will do so.

As a third concern, the farmers and ranchers need to know about the credit situation and whether the bill will provide some restructuring of those loans. By restructuring I mean longer terms, lower interest rates, a chance to recover. We have not come to that particular title in the bill, but when we do get to it, I think we will find that our committee and Congress want to provide the type of financing that will work and save as many ranchers and farmers as possible who are in distress at this time.

Another part of the bill deals with conservation, which is by far the best conservation section in any farm bill in history.

Another part is the food stamp title, which has to be reauthorized again.

Then there is a title on agricultural research.

I believe that on these parts of the bill, we are going to do credit to the Senate and to the country by presenting good titles. I hope we will have a very good, strong, far-reaching bill reported, and passed by the Senate, passed by the House, and signed by the President this coming September. Since this is August 1, that is next month. It would have been wiser to have it out earlier, but the situation was such that we could not, and we find that the House is in the same situation.

To be included in the farm bill, so far as I am concerned, are amendments I will offer dealing specifically with some unattended business. First, I believe that we cannot ignore the plight of the livestock producers of this country. Hogs and cattle are selling at miserable prices. It is a total disaster. Cattle prices are lower now than at any time I can recall since the early 1960's. These people have to have some kind of protection.

I believe we should have some restraints for a time on the amount of meat we are importing, whether live or fresh frozen or chilled or canned. I do not care how it comes into this country. I think we will have to have some restraint for a time in order to allow the markets in the United States to stabilize before the situation goes into utter disaster.

It is ironic that one of the reasons why we are having pressure on the cattle market and the hog market in the United States is the difference in the value of the Canadian dollar as compared to the American dollar. Their hogs and cattle have been pouring over the border into the United States because the Canadian dollar is worth about 32 cents more. That is the approximate difference between the Canadian and the U.S. dollar.

So their hogs and cattle have been pouring into this country while our market is clear down, and their market will fall clear down, too. Our two markets are tied together. There has to be some restraint at this time in order to allow the U.S. market, the much larger market, to stabilize and come back. I do not think we can act on that too soon. The farm bill seems to be the quickest way of addressing the problem.

I hope we can discuss this during August with our Canadian friends and see what we can work out between them and us so that we can stabilize this livestock market and allow it to recover.

Mr. President, people are going to say, "What about the budget I guess it depends upon whose computer you are looking at or how you put in the figures.

The House committee has a package very similar to what we are hammering out in the Senate committee, and they find that they are within the budget. I am not going to say that the Department of Agriculture computer is wiser than the Congressional Budget Office computer. I do not think either computer makes a difference. I think they are equally wise. But it depends on who puts in the figures. The Department of Agriculture, on their assumptions, comes back with a larger cost than the Congressional Budget Office. That can be hammered out, and we can arrange to make sure that the budget that is allowed for agriculture is sufficient to preserve the agricultural economy and preserve these operators on their farms and ranches without them going broke.

It is absolutely essential that that happen because this agricultural economy is the whole underpinning of the country.

While it looks like we are going into an agricultural depression, we want to turn that around quickly enough so these farmers and ranchers can survive and that we can save the whole U.S. economy from going into a very deep recession. It is that critical.

So on the budget we will do what we have to do to meet whatever it is set at. It has not been finalized yet. Whenever it is, we will try to live with it or get some emergency measures with which we can put up for a while but hold back enough so the cost is not overrunning us in the final analysis.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I compliment the Senator from Montana on his statement and leadership on the agricultural crisis which faces the country. He and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIXON], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARKIN], and others, have been on the forefront speaking not just for political party but for an entire industry and this Nation. I want to identify very strongly with the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER].

There is something remarkable and something remarkably wrong in the United States of America in the 1980's, when we can be one of the two host nations for one of the greatest fundraising efforts in the history of the world to alleviate hunger in Africa at a time when American producers are losing their land and ability to produce the very grain and agricultural products necessary to meet that disaster.

The efforts made by the Senator from Montana and our colleagues who are concerned on the broad base of agricultural production in this country will not go unnoticed by the people of this Nation or the people of the world. I think as long as we continue to speak out for what is fair and just, not just for the producers of this Nation but the needs of hungry people around the world, there will be those who will hear that message and respond to it.

A LITTLE BIT OF THE TOTAL RAISED FOR THE FARMER AND FOOD ASSISTANCE

At no time in recent history has world opinion closed ranks on a question of basic importance as it has in recent days. Just weeks ago the world conscience was stirred by the Aid for Africa concerts. Performers supporting Aid for Africa donated their services and within hours of the event raised upward of $70 million for a program of food procurement and transportation for innocent victims of the forces of nature.

The drought in Africa may continue, Mr. President, but with a welling of public opinion a drought of the spirit has ended.

Bob Dylan began his performance with a plea for realization that food is vital to all life. He reminded the audience as well, of the plight of America's farmers, going broke in record numbers. "A Little Bit of the Total Raised," he said, "Should go to the family farmer."

In the budget climate we are operating in right now, Mr. President, I want to echo that sentiment. While we are attempting to forge a 1985 farm bill I hope we will remember "A Little Bit of the Total" should go to the family farmer.

After perpetrating the most expensive farm program in the history of American agriculture, the Reagan administration has kept the Senate Agriculture Committee tied in knots in an attempt to apply so-called free-market principles to American farm programs. They seek to reduce target prices and loan rates. They want to depress the market price of grains. By reducing farm income over the next 4 years they seek to drive massive numbers of farmers over the brink of financial disaster. At the same time this administration has rejected all compromises attempted to date on the budget. Compromises which could foster an atmosphere conducive to reducing interest rates. Interest rates which are driving farmers from the land.

I contrast, many members of the Senate Agriculture Committee seek to enact a system of tiered price supports which I have long advocated and which met a warm welcome in family farm States. The committee, on some very close votes, has attempted to maintain farm income while targeting the benefits to struggling small and medium sized family farms. I will continue to support them in those efforts in the Senate.

The committee has favored a 4-year bill which would freeze target prices and allow the administration some leeway on adjusting loan rates. They have been hamstrung by unceasing efforts to cut those supports in the later years covered by the bill. Those efforts emanate from the White House and the Office of Management and Budget. Those efforts will continue when a bill is finally brought to this body for consideration. We have a lot to do to make sure this farm bill will provide direct assistance to the family farmer.

The farm bill must be a vehicle to help farmers through these tough financial times. It must be a vehicle to bring food to the hungry of this Nation and other nations of the world. It should not be a vehicle to provide uncontrolled price support payments to large corporate superfarms as occurred under the Reagan administration's budget-busting PIK Program.

It must contain reasonable set asides for major commodities which we already possess in surplus. It must provide an incentive for farmers to participate and it must be stable and long term, so America's farmers know what to expect. I prefer a 4-year program. I do not think we should throw renewal of this program, so vital to farmer's interests, into the heat of the political arena 2 years hence. It might serve some politician's interests, but it will not serve the Nation. Farmers need the long-term stability of a 4-year program and they need it now.

Farmers can be guaranteed availability of credit by this legislation. Right now that is an unsure proposition for many of them. We will be addressing additional assistance in the near future for the farm credit system.

We can guarantee that farmers receive if not a fair price, which they so desparately need, at least a stable price so they can plan the future of their operations.

In the name of budget fairness, we can guarantee that the large amounts of money we spend out of necessity on farm programs are not skimmed off by the superfarms. I welcome those who believe with me that cash payments must be targeted to the small and medium sized farms. We can tier cash payments to the first 20,000 and 40,000 bushels on a range of commodities. That will target help to those who need it most. At the same time we must provide an equitable cap on the amount of payments that can be received by an individual producer and we must bring all aspects of the farm program under that ceiling.

I hope too that this Senate will renew a dairy program which has already saved taxpayer's money over previous years and has encouraged a drop in overproduction. The paid diversion program has saved well over a billion dollars in the last year and has provided stability for our dairy farmers. At the same time it encourages reduced production farmers themselves to finance the program. Crafted by the Senator from Iowa, Senator HARKIN, when he chaired the Dairy, Poultry, and Livestock Subcommittee in the House, it has been reaffirmed by the House committee this year. I hope we will join in that effort for the sake of consumers and dairy farmers.

This farm bill must provide equity for America's farmers. I will oppose all efforts on the floor of the Senate attempting to knock the props from under Colorado farmers. Our wheat farmers, sugar beet producers and others are hard pressed. We cannot balance the budget on the backs of those who feed this Nation. Colorado farmers are looking for a possible record wheat crop this year. The price they will receive in a depressed marketplace takes much of the pride of production away.

Though farmers constitute 2 percent of our budgetary outlays this year they are being asked to take 6 percent of the budget cuts. If all areas of the budget were being asked to take like cuts this might be considered fair, but that is plainly not the case.

From my position on the Armed Services Committee I have just witnessed this administrations insistence that weapon system after weapon system be funded at levels exceeding anything we contemplate spending on efforts to save our family farms. An additional $6 billion may be authorized by the Secretary of Defense on August 31 for the aimless Divad gun. We ask for targeted farm programs and they give us a gun that can't shoot straight.

I am suggesting that the priorities approved at the White House, and some in this Congress, are out of sync with the hopes and desires of our country. A little bit of the total raised should go to the family farmer. A little bit of the total should go to those at home and abroad who are going hungry.

Every national poll on the subject tells us that Americans believe in support for the family farm. They believe in feeding those who are unable to feed themselves. They believe in preserving our resources for a future of food abundance. They believe in competing in world markets.

Farmers whether in Colorado or Kansas, Iowa, or Illinois deserve to know what the future holds for them at the earliest possible time. The farm program should reflect their concerns and those of the American public in general.

Insensitivity to the problems facing rural America is not being accepted back home. There is good reason for the farmer demonstrations; there is good reason for the farm crisis committees which have formed; and there is a genuine reason to fear a collapse of the farm credit system. With its associated impact on 23 percent of our gross national product, the effect of such a disaster would reach to Wall Street, corporate board rooms and even to the White House.

We have the choice, provide funding for reasonable farm programs now or pay the price later. Provide a little bit of total raised or suffer the consequences.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I am delighted to be involved in the discussion that was called by the majority leader on the questions concerning the 1985 farm bill and the budget.

My colleague from Arkansas has suggested to me that this is like the war that was declared but no one came. I look across the Chamber and note that very little contribution to this subject matter is being made by my friends on the majority side, which leads me to my first point which is this one: My colleagues on this side have religiously attended meetings of the Agriculture Committee since the beginning of our work on the 1985 farm bill. The chairman has said that there have been 70 of these. I have not kept count. But I have been to almost all of the meetings of the committee, even when I was a member of the conference committee on the DOD authorization bill with my distinguished friend in the chair. I attended the meetings that were called separately in the majority leader's office. I had the pleasure of attending the meetings with four of the Secretaries of Agriculture who are still alive, and who came in from all parts of the country to give us the benefit of their points of view. So I attended the meetings.

Yesterday morning, shortly before noon, the majority leader prevailed on a close vote. The vote was on a motion made by the majority leader, not by this side, by the majority leader, to freeze supports for the commodities for the American farmers for the first 2 years and lower it 5 percent in the third and fourth years. That was the majority leader's motion and it prevailed.

Thereafter, my colleague from Montana, the distinguished Senator from Montana, offered a motion—which was the last order of business before we adjourned for lunch—to simply freeze for 4 years, instead of 2 years, and in the third and fourth years, to maintain the support system with up to 5 percent of the deficiency payment made in commodities in the third year and up to 7½ percent of the deficiency payment in the fourth year.

I have not done the arithmetic on this yet. It is being done. But I assert that the difference between the position of my distinguished colleague from Montana and the position of the majority leader is probably less than $1 billion over the 4-year life of the farm bill, a figure of little consequence when set against all of the money that is being spent here, including, as my distinguished colleague in the chair knows, the $302.5 billion DOD authorization bill for this year.

Now, after this vote in the Agriculture Committee yesterday morning, we were supposed to meet in the afternoon at 3 o'clock. That meeting was called off and we did not meet. A long discussion took place last night, and we were told that this issue would be resolved this morning at 10 a.m.

But shortly before the appointed hour, the meeting was called off. I simply want to announce for this side, before we go home and visit with our agricultural constituency, that this side stood prepared to the final moment to vote on this floor a 1985 farm bill. It was the strongest farm bill ever written by the Congress of the United States on conservation questions, a farm bill that had resolved the major issues on food stamps and would have addressed, yesterday afternoon or this morning, the final problem of commodities.

Now, none of us deny, Mr. President, that there are budget considerations. I voted in the Armed Services Committee, where I had the honor of serving with the Chair, and where I have the honor of being the ranking minority member on the Preparedness Subcommittee that the President chairs, for zero absolute growth for the DOD authorization bill for this year. I lost. But I voted for that.

I have voted twice on the floor of the Senate here for a freeze, including entitlements, and I have lost, but I voted for that.

I hold in my hand, Mr. President, what purports to be the probable result of the budget conference between the House and Senate on the budget. There is a division in my party and I believe the fact is that there is a division in your party, Mr. President, on how many will support this result. But speaking for this Senator from Illinois, half a loaf is better than none, and I will vote for whatever the result is, because it is better than no budget, and I deplore the fact that the result could not be a better one.

But let me say this: The debate here is on whether you will give the American farmer and American agriculture, in desperate circumstances with the commodity prices at the lowest level in the last 7 years and with the value of land in Illinois dropping in the last year, equity. Mr. President, listen to this: Last year in my State the land values dropped 27 percent, the greatest in the modern history of our country.

Land values in Illinois in 1933, in the depth of the Depression, dropped 19 percent, but in Illinois last year they dropped 27 percent.

So while American agriculture faces this problem, my colleagues—my distinguished colleague from Montana, my distinguished colleague from Arkansas, my distinguished colleague from Iowa, and my friend on the other side, my distinguished colleague from North Dakota—and I are fighting to preserve a freeze, nothing more for the next 4 years than they enjoy now.

Now, what has the Budget Committee done? In defense, the Budget Conference Committee accepted the Senate figure. Let the record show, Mr. President, that means that next year defense spending will grow approximately 4 percent while, if we win, the money we spend on farmers grows not at all.

And let the record show that in the second year, defense spending will grow 3 percent plus inflation, which will be at least 7 percent, while, if we win, agriculture's budget will not grow at all. And let the record show that in the third year, if this budget resolution passes, defense will again grow 3 percent plus inflation, while the farmer support system will not grow at all.

Now, if my math serves me, that means that in the next 3 years, defense spending will probably grow a total of 18 percent while support programs for the American farmer will not grow a bit.

The COLA's—there are no changes from current policy on cost of living adjustments for retirement programs. I agree that there is a major difference in the Congress about that question. But I want to point out that for every person on an entitlement, on Social Security, military pensions or any other retirement system in the United States of America, their support system will grow every year at the inflationary rate of at least 4 percent, that being the ordinary average, for the next 3 years, a total of 12 percent, while under this proposition the farmer will have no additional increase at all.

The truth is that the 1985 farm bill that we have been discussing in committee is a modest attempt to support American agriculture at the reasonable level now enjoyed by the agricultural community. The difference between what the majority leader has prevailed upon in the committee and what we would suggest ought to be in the bill is a sum of money probably less than $1 billion.

Mr. President, I talked yesterday briefly about the Divad gun. And I want to take another shot at that gun that cannot hit anything. I have written a letter today, as a member of the Armed Services Committee, Mr. President, to the distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee. The Secretary of Defense, by August 30, while we are away, has to certify whether he believes that the Divad gun meets the specifications in order to unfence the money that I fenced, as a member of the Armed Services Committee, in a long and arduous session there where we were finally able to convince the committee that the gun was a questionable gun and the $4 to $6 billion that might be spent on it ought not to be spent on it.

I have today asked the chairman of the Armed Services Committee to hold hearings when we get back on that Divad gun. But so that people in this country, Mr. President, can understand what we are debating on the floor of the U.S. Senate today, I want the people of this country to understand that if we cut back the purchase of the Divad gun that cannot hit anything, if we cut back the purchase of the Divad gun that has never hit anything 25 percent over the life of the 1985 farm bill, it would pay—that one gun that never hit a thing—would pay for the difference between the position taken by the majority leader in the Agriculture Committee and this side. Believe it or not, that is a fact.

So I will only say this in conclusion: We have come to the floor of the U.S. Senate 2 days in a row to argue about the question of the American farmer and budgetary constraints. We have spent more time on the poor American farmer on this issue than on all the issues on these two pages of the Budget Committee report. And the plain fact is that there is not anything in the country that will do more for a viable, increasingly exuberant economy than the American farmer. The best investment, in my view, that this country can make is the investment we will make in maintaining farm price supports at the present level for the next 4 years.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. PRYOR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRASSLEY). The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President I associate myself with the remarks just given by my distinguished colleague from Illinois, Senator DIXON, and those given by Senator MELCHER, from Montana, and Senator HART, from Colorado.

I might also note, Mr. President, that 1 hour into this so-called colossal debate; that has been scheduled for the Senate floor, on the farm bill and program costs, we have had no debate. Up until just the past several moments, there have been only a few Members on this side of the aisle and I now see some Members on the other side of the aisle. I hope this discussion will be constructive and I hope we can come to grips with some of the problems agriculture is facing.

Mr. President, relative to the Divad gun, the $6 billion gun that my colleague from Illinois says will not hit a thing, I would just predict, Mr. President, that during the week of August 23, we are going to see a glowing report from either the Office of Operational Testing or the Pentagon, talking about how wonderful and how accurate this gun is and how we must rush production of the Divad gun. But, I hope, before that happens, that we will certainly give the Senator from Illinois another chance to fire that gun to see if it has improved. And I hope that the Pentagon will be honest with us before we rush into spending that $6 billion.

Mr. President, at this point in the RECORD, I would like to have printed an article on the Wharton School of Economic Study that was published this week in the Des Moines Register. Mr. President, with special attention on a paragraph in this article that states:

> If farm loan losses reach $50 billion the result will be a $42 billion increase in the Federal debt.

Mr. President, I think this study is quite significant. I now ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FARM CRISIS THREATENS ECONOMY, STUDY WARNS

(By John Hyde)

WASHINGTON, DC.—An economic study released Tuesday by the national Corn Growers Association says the entire U.S. economy will suffer "serious consequences" unless steps are taken to resolve the farm debt crisis.

The analysis indicates the debt crisis will result in "higher interest rates, lower employment, reduced gross National Product, lower personal income and a larger federal deficit * * * if preemptive actions are not taken."

The study was performed by Wharton Econometric Forecasting Associates of Philadelphia, with the help of the Food and Agriculture Policy Research Institute at Iowa State University and the University of Missouri.

FARM LOAN LOSSES

Some data used in the study were provided by Farm Journal magazine, which recently completed an extensive survey of farm debt load.

The economists concluded farm loan losses of $25 billion during the next four years would result in a $21.5 billion increase in the federal debt, increase short-term interest rates by 1.25 percentage points, reduce total employment by 275,000 jobs and reduce the Gross National Product by $50 billion over eight years.

"This study points out that you can pay now or you can pay later," National Corn Growers Association President Varel Bailey told a Capitol Hill news conference. Bailey is a grain and livestock farmer from Anita, IA.

Bailey emphasized that farm loan losses could be much greater than $25 billion during the coming four years if farm price supports are eliminated or net farm income drops for some other reason. If farm loan losses reach $50 billion, according to the study, the result will be a $42.2 billion increase in the federal debt.

The Wharton study also stated:

About $140 billion of the $210 billion in total U.S. farm debt is held by farms with debt-to-asset ratios of 40 percent or more. These farms are most likely to "experience financial stress," the study said.

Young farmers living in the central United States have the highest debt-to-asset ratio of farmers in any age group or region. The average debt-to-asset ratio for farmers under 35 years of age living in the central states exceeds 50 percent. "We could potentially lose an entire generation of farmers, based on those figures," said Bailey.

Net farm income in likely to remain between $20 billion and $25 billion unless the government intervenes with an active support program. Even to maintain the $20 billion to $25 billion net farm income figure, government supports of $6 billion to $7 billion annually would be required.

The "most optimistic" of farm programs being considered in Congress would not result in a net farm income increase during the coming five years. If government support programs were eliminated, as the Reagan administration has proposed, net farm income would drop 40 percent in three years.

NEXT WEEK

The conclusions were set out in a brief summary of the Wharton Econometric study. The full study will not be released until next week.

Bailey said his association was releasing a preliminary version of the study in hopes of having an impact on farm legislation being debated in both the Senate and House agriculture committees.

"What we do in the short term will affect agricultural credit in the long term," he said. "We're laying the concrete now. I sure hope we don't have to take jackhammers and tear it up later on."

Bailey said the genesis of the study was a meeting between Budget Director David Stockman and Iowa Gov. Terry Branstad, in which the governor appealed for federal help to ease the farm debt crisis. Stockman reportedly told Branstad. "If you can show the ag crisis affects the rest of the country, then we'll do something."

Bailey said his group then "took up the challenge" of demonstrating the effect of the farm debt crisis on the U.S. economy as a whole.

TOP TO BOTTOM

"These figures are significant to me as a manager," Bailey said. "They say we can ignore the problem and pay the social and economic consequencies later, or we can address the problem now and have a stronger economy from top to bottom."

Bailey said he had presented the study's findings earlier in the week to officials of the Reagan administration, including Agriculture Secretary John Block, and they were well received. "We were surprised" by the administration's reaction, Bailey said.

Block told the corn growers, "These are the kind of numbers we have to have to prove our point to other people in the government," Bailey said.

Bailey said comments such as Block's have led him to conclude the administration is "reconsidering the ag issue" and will be more favorably inclined to support aid to farmers.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, we now have had a debate on this farm bill for several months.

One of the issues in the debate is whether or nor we should concentrate on exports, or trying to make certain that we recognize the necessity of allowing some price to the farmer who produces these items for export.

It is my opinion, after listening to the U.S. Department of Agriculture, that it is their policy that we first build a farm bill around exports. I am not saying that I oppose that position 100 percent, but I do feel that we must have a program, we must develop a policy, that is going to make absolutely certain that the prices ultimately paid to that farmer provide a net profit on what that farmer produces.

If we permit or if we encourage a policy that will give that farmer a price, we are certainly going to cure a lot of economic ills in our country.

One of the major debates after Labor Day, Mr. President, is our discussion about the philosophy of exports versus price. To say that we can separate price from credit—and I think once again that this might be the policy being enunciated by our present farm policy and especially by our present administration—is flawed and I hope we will give it our most careful and proper consideration.

Mr. President, at this time, as I see the very distinguished majority leader and also a member of the Agriculture Committee on the floor, I would like to ask the distinguished majority leader about a particular piece of legislation that in 1978 the majority leader himself introduced on February 2.

I hope—and I say this in friendship—that this piece of legislation introduced by Senator DOLE, Senator Tower, Senator THURMOND, Senator ZORINSKY, Senator Allen, Senator Curtis, Senator Hayakawa, Senator DOMENICI, Senator WEICKER, and Senator Schmidt, on February 2, 1978, might be discussed as a possible option after we return from our August recess.

I am not saying it is perfect or I am not saying it is going to work, and I am not saying it is going to bail us out of the farm crisis we are in today. But it should be discussed as a possibility.

Quoting the majority leader's words on February 2, 1978, he states:

This bill will not interfere with exports. It will not contribute to farm production increase. It will not encourage subsidies. And under my bill costs will be reasonable since scaled-down production will result in higher market prices resulting in a reasonable level of deficiency payments.

Once again, we have not had the opportunity to examine this concept as it relates to today's prices, or as it relates to both deflated farm prices and deflated farm land values, but I have been looking at this particular bill and I, for one, will be doing a lot of studying and asking a lot of people about a flexible parity plan. I think we must do it sincerely because the present bill under consideration is not a bill that is going to help because it is not going to provide a great enough cash flow for our farmers.

I think we might be starting off at the beginning, not the end, of this farm debate after the Labor Day period.

Mr. HARKIN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. PRYOR. I yield for a question.

Mr. HARKIN. I thank the Senator. The Senator from Arkansas has given us a good reminder of the fact that we have not recently examined this flexible parity approach, which was considered back in 1978.

Do I understand that this flexible parity approach actually passed the Senate?

Mr. PRYOR. It was referred to the Agriculture Committee at that time, in 1978. I understand from reading the RECORD that there were hearings held around the country, one in South Carolina, held by the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, Senator THURMOND, and others.

Mr. HARKIN. If the Senator will yield further, I am sorry I did not quite hear him correctly, I do not believe, but did I hear a quotation about reduced production would yield higher prices and, therefore, would not have a lowering of income, that reduced production would increase the income?

Mr. PRYOR. It is in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The paragraph states, quoting from Senator DOLE:

Under my bill, costs would be reasonable since scaled-down production should result in higher market prices resulting in a reasonable level of deficiency payments.

And it goes farther.

I also share what he said in 1978, and we can certainly agree with this statement in 1985, when he said:

Farmers are caught in a vicious cost-price squeeze and they, the American farmers, are unable to recover cost of production. Their situation is the worst since the Great Depression.

Since that time, many many farmers have gone out of business. So it has gotten a lot worse since Senator DOLE mentioned this in his discussion on his bill.

Mr. HARKIN. If the Senator will yield further, I might point out that if the majority leader thought the times were bad in 1978, I will point out that recent figures show that farm income parity is now at 52 percent, the lowest it has ever been, even lower than it was during the Great Depression. So if times were bad in 1978, I will submit that they are twice as bad right now.

If the Senator will yield further, on that passage referring to the majority leader's statements about reduced production leading to higher market prices, if I am not mistaken, the Senator from Arkansas, this Senator, and others have been for some time talking in the Agriculture Committee about that kind of an approach. Really, what do we not want is to put farmers on welfare. Farmers do not want to get Government paychecks. Farmers want to earn their income from the marketplace.

As the Senator knows, I have used the example before that those who want farmers to produce, produce, produce, plow up to the fence-rows, plow up and down the hillsides and everything else, what they are really doing is just promoting bankruptcy among the farmers.

Using that kind of philosophy we could have Ford Motor Co., for example, operating their plants 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, 365 days a year to turn out as many cars as humanly possible.

Obviously, the reason they do not do that is because it would destroy the market.

I think those Senators who talk a lot about this marketplace approach are getting confused. There are two sides to the market. There is the willing buyer and there is also the willing seller. It seems to me that one of the things that makes the marketplace is that the seller can decide how much they want to contribute to the market. If they flood the market, of course, it depresses the prices; in fact, that is what is happening now with the farmers. It is because of Government policies, because of Government policies for the past 3 or 4 years which have forced farmers into this untenable position.

Now what I hear is that they want to push the farmers even further to produce more and more and get less and less for it.

I think the majority leader was right in 1978 in uttering those words, that by perhaps reducing our production it would increase the market price. I think that is what we have been talking about: A good supply management program, well managed by the Department of Agriculture, would keep our supply in line with demand. The reason that our farm economy is in the terrible situation it is in today, is that it has been horribly mismanaged over the last 4 years. In the first 2 years, 1981 and 1982, no meaningful set-asides, no reduction in production, plant fence-row to fence-row. Then they came in with the PIK Program, the largest set-aside in the history of this country. Of course, we all know how that operated.

First, the USDA came to us and said it would not cost anything. This is the same Department that is throwing these figures around now. They said it would not cost anything. Secretary Block said that before the House Agriculture Committee when I was in the other body. Then we found out it would cost billions of dollars.

In fact, 50 percent of the PIK payments went to 5.6 percent of the largest farmers.

So they had this massive set-aside. The next year, they bounced back again to really no effective set-aside at all. So there has not been any real management by the Department of Agriculture of our farm economy over the last 4 years. Farmers have been pushed from one extreme to the other. Now they are being told that the Department is going to wash its hands of it, that this administration will just walk away from the farmers and let those individual farmers compete with the Government of Argentina or the Government of Brazil or the European Economic Community.

What I understand my farmers want is the marketplace, which means they want supply in line with demand, so they get the price up, so they are able to make their profit in the marketplace and not because of a paycheck that comes from the Government.

I guess, in looking at this again, the question I wanted to propound to my dear friend from Arkansas is this: They are talking about reducing budget deficits, they are talking about this farm bill, about how much it is going to increase costs and all that. But it seems to me if we had just a little bit better management in the Department of Agriculture to manage effectively our set-asides, the farmers themselves would actually get their money from the marketplace; we would not have to get it out of the budget; we would not have to increase the deficit. That really is the way we ought to be going.

I want to get into that because we have heard a lot of talk about how much it is going to cost for this farm bill. As someone said the other day, you either pay now or you pay later; if you pay now you are going to pay a lot less than you will pay later. A 4-year freeze on target prices, I think, is the minimum we can accept. And even if you do that—a lot of people think that is going to keep income constant, but in fact, even if there is only a 4-percent inflation over the next 4 years, this is going to be a 16-percent real reduction in income to our farmers. Even if we freeze target prices.

Farmers are willing to take their share of sacrifice, but over the next 4 years, to have a reduction in their income of 16 percent, and that is just from a target price freeze, I think it is unfair to ask them to take more than that. I think it would be an unfair sacrifice.

The farm credit system reported last week that short-term borrowing increased from 5 to 22 basis points above the T-bill rate because of nervousness on Wall Street about the stability of the system. This represents an increase of $119 million in added interest costs to the borrowers of the system—$119 million in just the last week, added on top of all the other burdens the farmers have had, just because of the increase in the basis points because of the nervousness on Wall Street regarding the farm economy.

So, in looking at this, what we are seeing is a huge devaluation and loss of equity in our farm land and income to farmers. Wharton Econometrics did a study that showed if we took the so-called free market operation that we are being asked to take in the Agriculture Committee by the administration, we could have as much as a $50 billion discharge in agricultural debt. What this would mean throughout the country, is that this $50 billion of discharged agricultural debt would result in short-term interest rates—not just to farmers but all interest rates—going up by 2.5 percent.

Think what that will cost our economy: The study projects reduced business investment of $74 billion, a reduced output of our GNP of $96.7 billion, a total employment loss of 560,000 jobs, an increased Federal debt of $42.2 billion—just because of the discharge of this debt. So what we are talking about is that if we have that kind of discharge, the Federal debt is going up by $42 billion.

If, however, we freeze these target prices and we take the necessary preemptive action, we could have, perhaps, a minimum of even $10 billion being written off. The study projects the Federal debt would increase by only $5 billion.

So, if we go the way the administration wants us to go, the Federal debt will increase by $42 billion. If we have a target price freeze, we will have an increase in the Federal debt of $5 billion, for a difference of about $37 billion. In other words, by adding a little bit now to freeze the target prices, we will save going into debt by about $37 billion over the next 8 years.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that all of these figures that have come out from Wharton Econometrics and every other place only point to one course of action for us to take. That is to take preemptive action, to take the action needed now to prevent the fall in land prices and to keep this debt from being discharged in the amount that it will be discharged if, in fact, we take the administration's approach and reduce farm income.

I might just add that last evening, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Agriculture talked about the average farmer having a net worth of $500,000. I got to looking into that. That did not sound quite right to me. What I found out is that from the 1980 census survey of a certain segment of farmers, indeed their net worth was $500,000. I began thinking about that.

That sounds like a lot, and it is a lot. But look at it this way: Let us say an Iowa farmer had 500 acres which had a value of $2,000 an acre. Let us say he had it half paid for in 1980, which was not out of line. His net worth would have been $500,000. But, since 1981, farm land values in Iowa have gone down an average of $1,000 an acre. So that farmer, who had a net worth of $500,000 when that census was taken in 1980, his net worth is now down to zero.

In fact, that is what happened. In Iowa, we lost $32 million in equity alone just since 1981.

So, again, as the distinguished Senator from Arkansas was pointing out, we really do have to take preemptive action. I am hopeful that we could take a harder look at the flexible parity concept, because I think there may be some promise there. It will give us the ability to have a higher support price for those farmers who take out more land out of production and less of a support price to those who take out less.

I would just like to ask the distinguished Senator from Arkansas who, indeed, does have the floor and has been so kind to yield me this time—I understand that last night, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Agriculture said, and I am quoting his words from the RECORD, in response to a question, I think, propounded by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. EXON]—who, I see, is on the floor at this time—the Agriculture Committee was going to meet today at 10 o'clock in the morning.

To quote his words, he said:

I know this public display will be interesting news back home, but this committee has met regularly, it will, and we are scheduled to meet tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock, and I shall be there rapping the gavel tomorrow at 10 o'clock, Lord willing.

I know the Senator from Arkansas serves on the Agriculture Committee with this Senator. We were ready to meet at 10 o'clock this morning. I thought we had assurances that we were going to meet so that we could have voted on this and voted out a bill. We were ready to go. I thought we had assurances that we were going to meet, and we did not meet. Does the Senator from Arkansas have any information as to why the meeting was canceled this morning at 10 o'clock? I just wonder if the Senator has heard anything or if he can enlighten us as to why we did not meet?

Mr. EXON. Will the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. PRYOR. The Senator from Arkansas does not know. The Senator from Arkansas, like the Senator from Iowa, got to work this morning and was ready to go to the Agriculture Committee meeting. At about 9:30 or so I was informed that the Agriculture Committee would not meet. Perhaps the majority leader or especially the chairman of the Agriculture Committee, who is now on the floor, could tell us why we in fact did not meet.

Mr. EXON. If the Senator will yield, I think I could answer his question.

Mr. HARKIN. The Senator from Arkansas has the floor.

Mr. EXON. Will the Senator yield for just a second?

Mr. DOLE. The Senator does not know the answer. How can he answer the question?

Mr. EXON. I know the answer. If I may have a chance to explain it.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, let me, if I might say to my very good friend from Nebraska, because the name of the chairman has been brought into the discussion, yield to the Senator from North Carolina, and then I will be happy to yield to the Senator.

Mr. EXON. I would be happy to.

I wonder if the Senator from North Carolina might be willing to yield to me just a moment. I think I might be able to help him out just a little bit. I always try to be helpful whenever I can.

The answer to the question propounded by the Senator from Iowa is very simple. The chairman of the Agriculture Committee said he would meet at 10 o'clock this morning, the Lord willing. I suspect that the chairman of the Agriculture Committee was willing but, obviously, the Lord was not. I do not know what other explanation could possibly be offered, but I just want to be helpful wherever I can to the distinguished chairman of the Agriculture Committee. I yield.

Mr. PRYOR. I yield for a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas yields the floor. The Chair recognizes the majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, there was a Republican conference at 10 o'clock this morning and there was a Democratic caucus at 10:30 to talk about the budget, which I will get into later, but I prefer, unless somebody else feels compelled to speak, that perhaps we could let a couple people on this side speak, and I would like to follow the distinguished chairman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader. There may have been a less difficult question to answer than the question propounded by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas, but the committee could scarcely meet with the majority and minority having called conferences on the budget.

Now, I know the Senator from Arkansas agrees with me that the No. 1 responsibility facing this Congress is to try to come up with something that makes sense in terms of the Federal budget. In any case, no committees met at 10 O'clock or thereafter. As a matter of fact, the Democratic conference had to extend past noon. So I think the distinguished Senator from Iowa is chasing a rabbit and he did not quite catch one when he raised the question of why the committee did not meet.

Mr. President, let me level with my friends on the Agriculture Committee. As far as I know, I am still the chairman, and I do not propose to be deposed in terms of deciding what the agenda of the committee will be. I am anxious for the committee to meet, but I will tell Senators on what terms we are going to meet, and they can like it or lump it. That is, we are going to finish all of the farm bill and then do the commodities, because this chairman has sat patiently day after day, week after week, listening to filibusters. We are not going to do it any more. If Senators want to get the commodities, let us get through with the rest of the farm bill.

Mr. President, I have great affection for every member of the committee, but they have not fooled me 1 second. I made clear to the staff—and I think they will corroborate it—the first week of the markup that what was in progress was a filibuster. I have participated in a few around this place. But I say to the Senator from Iowa and anybody who is interested, we will be glad to meet the first opportunity, but we are going to finish the rest of the farm bill in the hope, the fervent hope of the chairman of the committee, that we can move along and finish the legislation.

Mr. MELCHER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HELMS. I do not believe I interrupted the Senator when he was speaking, if he will forbear. Now, then——

Mr. MELCHER addressed the Chair.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, who has the floor?

Mr. MELCHER. I do not want to interrupt the Senator. I would like to ask him to yield.

Mr. DOLE. Regular order.

Mr. HELMS. Regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And he does not desire to yield. The Senator from North Carolina may proceed.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Chair.

Let us go back in history just a little bit, Mr. President, on this farm bill. First of all, at the outset, the first crack of the bat, I made it clear that this Senator, the chairman of the Agriculture Committee, was not going to be a party to an irresponsible farm bill, one that is a budget buster. I said in committee, I said on this floor—I meant it and I mean it—that if it requires me to be the first chairman in the history of the Agriculture Committee to vote against a farm bill, I will do it rather than put my imprimatur on an irresponsible farm bill.

Now, that is the crux of the problem. I will get into the arithmetic of it in just a little bit.

Here we are, the Nation staggering under a Federal deficit with very little hope, as I see it, that we will get out of this deficit problem. We have had proposal after proposal not to reduce spending, not even to hold it in line but to escalate it, and now we are talking about a $20 billion escalation in the costs of the farm bill.

Mr. President, I will have no part of that. I made that clear from the very beginning, and I am not going to play politics. I am not going to mislead the farmers of America, because the farmers of America are not stupid. They know the genesis of their problem. Their problems began right here in the Congress of the United States decades ago when it became so fashionable to spend money we did not have, to place burdens on the coming generation.

The truth is, Mr. President, that the string has run out. We have no more illusions. We have no more subterfuges to advance. We have to put up or shut up with respect to the way this Nation is going.

The problems of the American farmer began right here, and we cannot pretend that we are going to dole out more and bail out more and solve the problems of the farmers, because they know better than that.

Let us suppose that there was an epidemic of common sense in Congress for a change.

Mr. DOLE. Do not worry about it.

Mr. HELMS. I am not worried about it.

Mr. DOLE. It will not happen.

[Laughter.]

Mr. HELMS. Let us suppose there would be the courage and the good sense to make the hard choices and to reduce Federal spending—not by the amount that was agreed upon by the conferees this morning but by enough to send a signal that this Congress, at long last, has come alive and realized our responsibility.

Interest rates would drop. Every percentage point that the interest rates would drop would mean an extra $2 billion in the pockets of the American farmers.

If you want a farm bill, let us practice some fiscal responsibility for a change and stop playing politics. But, no, that is not what I have heard: "Nail it down. Raise it up. To heck with how much it costs the American taxpayers. We are for the small farmers." Well, they are not.

It is demonstrable that what is being demanded will not benefit the small farmers but those big farmers, and that ought to raise some questions too, Mr. President.

Last year, at the beginning of this farm bill process—and I might add, parenthetically, that at that point I was in the middle of a political campaign and did not know whether I would be here. It really did not matter in terms of my wanting to be sure that we got off to a reasonable start toward a sensible farm program. I began by saying that one of the necessary objectives of the 1985 farm bill would be reduce Government spending on agriculture.

I did not sugarcoat the words. I was criticized in my campaign for being blunt, and that is all right. I have become accustomed to criticism. But I made the point that the more involved the American taxpayer and the Federal Government were, the less chance the American farmers had for profitability in the marketplace.

The irony is that in the past 5 years, as Government spending on farm programs has shot into the stratosphere, increasing 300 percent, farm income has decreased 27 percent. What does that say for Senators and Congressmen who say: "We must spend more; we must spend more"?

The U.S. share of world markets has eroded 10 percent during that period. That is the period when Federal expenditures on farm programs was going up 300 percent. We used to have a 50-percent share of the world market for agricultural products, and we have 40 percent today.

I think it is a fair conclusion—any logical American not involved in politics, at least, can see the handwriting on the wall. They can see what makes sense and what does not, if they are given the facts. But they are not.

I am not going to go into the news media situation, but I could. I say to my brethren in the news media that it is about time you spelled out what has happened to the American farmer and why.

One-fifth of what it costs a farmer in America today to do business is what? It is the interest on the debt he owes. Interest that is a result of what? Federal deficits, irresponsible economic policies by the Congress of the United States. So, what is it, other than a rhetorical sleight of hand, for the Senate to be talking about—and demands being made upon the chairman for—a farm bill that increases Government costs by billions of dollars?

Mr. President, what is being discussed today is a farm bill that will cost about $20 billion annually, up from the current level of about $12 billion right now, and just $4 billion annually a few years ago.

I was ready to have the committee meeting at 10 o'clock. The majority leader knows that. I commend the majority leader and the minority leader for making the judgment that Senators on both sides of the aisle should hear about the budget, because that, after all, is the No. 1 problem today.

As for the farm programs, I am willing to see this Government spend about $12 billion annually on the farm programs so long as that assistance is properly targeted to farmers who truly need the assistance and who would benefit from receiving it. I think $12 billion could be spent in a manner that would be appropriate and beneficial to the financially troubled farmers and improve the U.S. agricultural production system and increase our exports. But the bill we are talking about does not do that.

In fact, the expenditure of $20 billion a year would do far more to hurt farmers than help them. It would hurt farmers, first of all, obviously, because it would increase the deficit. It would hurt farmers because a large amount of the money would go to big, wealthy farmers.

Remember all the protestations made here on this floor: "We have to help the small family farmer." It is not so. They are talking about the big guys. I am being blunt because a lot of blunt things have been said; and, as they say down in North Carolina, I am not through yet.

Other Senators may vote, if they wish, to increase farm spending to $20 billion a year, but this Senator will not. So let us review the facts of where we now stand.

The budget resolution approved earlier this year by the Senate required savings in the agricultural functions—we call them the Commodity Credit Corporation, the Agricultural Credit Insurance Fund—this budget resolution required savings of $14.5 billion over a 3-year period. This includes $5.5 billion in Commodity Credit Corporation savings, and $9 billion in ACIF savings. The level for CCC outlays, which are the farm price supports and income support subsidies, for fiscal years 1986 to 1988, was $32.1 billion.

And the budget conference mark which was approved this morning for these same two functions, the CCC and the ACIF, that mark is $38.8 billion. And this includes about 4 billion for ACIF and $34.8 billion for CCC outlays in the fiscal years 1986 to 1988.

What does this mean, Mr. President? It means that the budget conference has increased the outlay ceiling for CCC programs by about $2.7 billion more than the Senate budget resolution level.

So, assuming for the moment that the new budget conference mark is the one we will end up using for CCC Programs, outlays allowed under the 1985 farm bill are $34.8 billion. In comparison to this new mark, the 4-year freeze being advanced in the Agriculture Committee by some of the members, will cost $53.2 billion for the 3-year period, which amounts to $18.4 billion more than the new budget mark and $21.1 billion over the old Senate budget resolution mark.

Now I ask you, Mr. President: Is that fiscal responsibility?

And to put into perspective the relative cost differences, maybe I should point out that if one were to consider the cost of the 4-year freeze proposal in the out-years, that is in the years 1989 through 1991, there would be an additional cost of $433.3 billion in outlays. If the 1-year freeze provided for in the originial Zorinsky-Dole proposal were adopted, the additional costs in the out-years from 1989 to 1991 would be $28.1 billion. So, the difference between the two proposals is just a little bit of pocket change around this place, $15.2 billion.

Local papers, please copy.

No, it is not pocket change. We are talking about real dollars and we are talking about real deficits. We are talking about an economic crisis in this country which has, of course, poured over onto the farmer.

The point, Mr. President, and I shall conclude, is that I decided early on that not only would this be bad fiscal policy, it would be bad farm policy. Beyond that, if we have any fidelity to our commitment to the American people as expressed in every political speech made by every Senator in this Chamber when he goes home, we have to say we cannot afford it, and it would be a cruel hoax on farmers and taxpayers alike to give any sort of indication that the proposal for the 4-year freeze being advanced has any chance of becoming a law.

Maybe what the Senators want to do is to have Ronald Reagan say, "Make my day; send me a bill like this." And I guarantee you that you will make his day.

I say again, in conclusion, I hope I will not hear any more suggestions that there was a breach of faith this morning about the Agriculture Committee meeting because every Senator who has mentioned it knows that both the Democrats and the Republians were meeting on the budget as well they should have been, and I say again, that when we meet, if we meet, and I want to meet as soon as possible, we are going to finish the farm bill because I want to spare myself all the filibusters. From now on I want some action on the remainder of the farm bill, and when we will get to the commodities. Unless I am——

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, will the chairman yield at that point?

Mr. HELMS. No.

Mr. MELCHER. Just to hear I agree with him on his scheduling.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina has the floor. He may continue.

Mr. HELMS. I think the record will show that I have not interrupted any Senator and I do not intend to. But I am saying that we will finish this farm bill, we will do it in an orderly process, and unless someone deposes me as chairman, and elects someone else, that is the way it is going to be.

Thank you, Mr. President.

I yield the floor.

STATUS OF THE 1985 FARM BILL DEBATE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, prior to the Fourth of July recess, I indicated my intention to have the farm bill—or at least a wheat bill—on the Senate floor before the August recess. I wanted to have the Senate act on farm legislation so that winter wheat farmers in Kansas and other States would have a fair idea of what their 1986 program will be before they begin planting in September.

The distinguished chairman of the Agriculture Committee, Senator HELMS, made every possible effort to report a bill during July. I believe he has said the committee held some 34 markup sessions on the various titles of the omnibus legislation during the past 2 months. I want the chairman to know how much this Senator and other wheat State Senators appreciate his efforts to accommodate our concerns to have a bill before the August recess.

Unfortunately, we have now reached the day before the recess is scheduled to begin and there is little likelihood that a commodities bill or a wheat bill can be brought to the floor and passed. I do not want to begin an acrimonious debate over why the Agriculture Committee has not yet reported legislation. There are a number of reasons, and they may all be valid.

The severe conditions in the farm economy today, and our determination to address them in this bill, have made committee members more deliberate in their actions. We spent weeks coming to a consensus on an approach to the basic provisions of the major commodity programs. In addition, there were at least a dozen objections on both sides of the aisle to the committee meeting in the afternoon or after the 2-hour limit in the morning.

IMPACT OF THE BUDGET CONFERENCE

Only this week, the abandonment of major deficit reduction objectives in the House-Senate budget conference had a significant impact on efforts to keep the cost of the farm bill under restraint. We now expect to consider a compromise budget resolution prior to going home for the recess, including a revised level for agriculture outlays. But we have not had the benefit of these numbers in recent weeks, and the Congressional Budget Office has not yet converted its budget estimates to the latest July cost projections.

So for a variety of reasons, Congress, the Senate, and the Agriculture Committees have not been able to meet the deadline for considering authorizing legislation for next year's farm programs. I understand that the House Agriculture Committee met this morning and came to much of the same conclusion. However, with a budget compromise likely to be agreed to, we should be able to get a better handle on the cost of various programs and come back in September with a realistic idea of where we are going.

Despite our difficulties in recent weeks, I believe there are enough similarities between the House and the Senate Agriculture Committee bills to give wheat farmers some idea of what next year's program will be.

I hope that Secretary Block can take these similarities into account in making a provisional announcement of the likely provisions on next year's wheat program before the August 15 deadline. He may not be able to specify the level for the acreage reduction percentage or the exact loan rate, but he should be able to give producers a good idea of what to expect.

THE TARGET PRICE QUESTION

Mr. President, as these details indicate, the Senate Agriculture Committee has reached agreement on most of the substantive details for the major commodity programs. The only outstanding issue of disagreement at this point is over the potential cost of the bill. And the key variable in the cost equation is the number of years for which target prices would remain at the current 1985 levels.

About a month ago, the distinguished ranking member of the committee, Senator ZORINSKY, proposed a framework for legislation that most members of the committee endorsed, and which we modified to provide for a 1-year target price freeze. The level of income support would be permitted to be adjusted down by 5 percent in the outyears. The committee adopted this version, the so-called Zorinsky-Dole bill, by a 10-to-7 vote.

Only last week, however, a bare majority of the committee decided to extend the target price freeze over the entire 4 years of the bill. Estimates of what the additional cost of the bill would be have varied widely, with USDA suggesting that it might cost an additional $18 billion over the life of the legislation. Unfortunately, the budget conference impasse and discrepancies between USDA and CBO baseline estimate prevented us from getting a reliable yardstick for comparing costs.

In an effort to get a broadly supported bill out of committee yesterday morning, we tried to get agreement on a compromise 2-year freeze, despite the expectation that it would be considerably out of budget. Although it passed on a 9-to-8 vote, it became clear to most committee members that we have not been able to reconcile policy expectations and desires with budget realities.

Earlier this week, I indicated that I might bring a separate bill to the floor as an amendment to another Agriculture Committee measure. Given the continuing confusion over what the numbers are, I decided that such an effort would not serve to resolve the remaining differences in committee. Instead, we agreed to have a thorough airing of where we are on the budget resolution today in the hope that some perspective can be introduced into the debate.

CHANGES IN BUDGET ESTIMATES

In looking over the most recent numbers, it is understandable how we have become so confused. The budget for the Commodity Credit Corporation in the original Senate budget resolution [SBR] is $32.1 billion. The SBR was developed using cost estimates based on conditions back in January. In July, the CBO raised the projected cost of CCC Programs by $8 billion, from $37.6 billion over fiscal year 1986-88 to $45.5 billion. With no budget resolution, it was unclear how much, if any, of this increased cost would need to be saved. The SBR called for savings of $5.5 billion, or the difference between the $37.6 baseline and the $32.1 CCC budget. But with no new mark, the July CBO estimates only distorted efforts to match up programs with their cost impact.

I now understand that the budget conference report will set a new target for agriculture outlays of $38.8 billion, including the Agriculture Credit Insurance Fund [ACIF] as well as the CCC. At this point, I have no clear idea of how close the various bills introduced in the Agriculture Committee may be to this mark. The committee has yet to consider all the provisions of the credit title, which are included in the new House-Senate mark. We will need to consider these programs together with the commodity programs in order to get a full picture of the budget situation.

USDA has made estimates of outlays under the three basic variations of the committee bill: the 1, 2, and 4-year freeze proposals. Basically, they start at about $51 billion over 3 years and go on up to near $84 billion over the life of the bill. Compared to the CCC/ACIF mark of $38.8 billion in the conference report, there is still a lot of work to do before we can pass a bill with a reasonable chance of surviving conference and being signed into law.

There are still ways available to bring the basic committee farm bill closer to budget reality. We have about $6 billion in surplus commodities in CCC ownership that have already been paid for. They could be used to supplement farm income in lieu of cash. We are likely to take over a large share of the commodities placed under CCC loan in 1985 as well. The committee has considered using commodity certificates to maintain farm income and may have to revisit this area when we come back in September.

Still, it would be a disservice to American farmers for any of us to go back to our States and make wild promises about how many years we are going to freeze target prices or income support. More than many of us here in Washington, farmers understand where our $2 trillion debt and $200 billion deficits came from. They know that irresponsible spending by Congress, without consideration of revenues, has been the prime source of most of their economic woes over the past few years. And they know that, even as congressional appetites for spending invariably exceed available revenues, we will not be able to meet the exaggerated demands of some Members when we return in September.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following tables on CCC savings targets, the budget conference status, and the USDA estimates on CCC outlays under farm bill proposals be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

$1.0 billion per year in direct credits for intermediate-term export credit program. If guaranteed credit is used, $3.0 billion would be saved over three years.

Average $1.0 billion cost of the conservation reserve. If CCC commodity payments are phased in over 3–4 years, up to $1.5 billion could be saved over three years.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I also thank the distinguished chairman for putting a few facts in the RECORD. Facts may confuse some people but it is nice to have them available, if people really want the facts.

It would seem to me that if we are really concerned about the farmer and especially the small farmer, then we should talk about payment limitations. If we want to make certain that the small farmer is protected, we ought to have payment limitations and we are going to have payment limitations unless we can work out some accommodation on a farm bill. It is a little hard to understand all the posturing going on about targeting income for the small or family sized farmer and then not doing anything about payment limitations. But we will have a chance to vote after the recess to see who wants to target income and who is concerned about the big farmers walking off with most of the money.

If the chairman is right, we are talking about $10 billion, $15 billion, or even $20 billion in extra costs. Where is it going to go? It is not going to go to the family farmer. It is going to go to the big farmer. It is not going to go to the farmer who is in trouble, and there are a good many farmers in trouble. The windfall is going to be reaped by large farmers in every State.

So I think we ought to start off any debate, whether it is now or when we have the farm bill up, to determine what we want to do. Do we want to talk about the family farmer while we are protecting and promoting the large farmer in America, or do we really want to protect the family farmer? If we want to protect the family farmer, then let's adopt smaller payment limitations—a $20,000 payment limitation would protect a lot of farmers. Oh, some would not like it because they can get more now. They can get $50,000 now and, under some of these schemes, they can get much more than that.

But if we are going to come to this floor, with everyone talking about the family farmer, then we should expect amendments to be offered to protect the family farmer.

It just seems to me we ought to get back to reality in this Chamber and we ought to talk about what happens to agriculture and not become embroiled in some political oneupmanship. That is what all this is about. The Senator from Montana wants the Agriculture Committee to meet again so he can slap on a 4-year freeze. I would be willing to set aside the vote we took yesterday to start all over after the recess, if there is some concern that somehow the Republicans or some members of the committee, 9 out of 17, have some advantage prior to the recess. I would be willing to convene the committee or ask the chairman to convene the committee to set aside yesterday's vote and then have everyone go home and listen to their farmers.

The only people being addressed now are about 25 people in the press gallery and some do not know a jersey cow from an oil well, but they are writing great stories back home about what we are doing in agriculture. They never once cite the cost, never once indicate what we are really doing and who is going to get the benefits. It is who is offering the most money. Whoever offers the most money is for the farmer and whoever offers less money is against the farmer. That is how it is reported and that is how it is received, and that is unfortunate.

But it seems to me we have a problem and it is called the Federal deficit. Some say, well, we are not going to take it out on the poor farmer. We have taken it out on the poor farmer for a long, long time by running up the debt, by making the dollar so high we cannot export, by raising his interest payments, by subsidizing his interest payments in the meantime so he buys more and more land which now has fallen, as everyone knows, to about half the value. And then we all talk about how to generate more income to the farmer. This is not income. We are talking about more subsidies. We are not talking marketplace; we are talking about more Federal payments to more farmers.

If that is what we want, then we ought to tell the farmer that he is going to get his income, but it is not going to be from the marketplace; it is going to be from the Federal Government.

The Senator from Montana has always got the plan to do more for the farmer. Spend more money—that is his recipe to help the farmer. Target the income—says the Senator from Oklahoma. Do not put any payment limits on it. Target the income for those 900-acre farmers, those average farmers.

It just seems to me that we can either decide during the recess whether we want to play politics or whether we want to address the farm problem, because it is real.

There are a lot of farm organizations that have farm proposals and they have constituents and they all get more members if their program passes, pretty much like politics. You have the Farm Bureau, they have a program, you have the Farmer's Union, they have a program; you have the NFO, they have a program; you have the AAM, they have a program; the Grange has a program; the wheat growers, the corn growers, the cotton growers, the rice growers, and we have to try to accommodate all of them. That is why we are in trouble.

I have a view that if some of the farmers in my State walked into our committee room and heard the discussion, they would probably go out and sell the farm. They would give up.

But I do not believe the answer to the American farmer is mortgaging his children's future so he can get bigger subsidy payments and no increase in the market price. We are not competitive in the world markets, and I think most people agree with that and most Senators agree on both sides of the aisle.

But we cannot have it both ways. We cannot say, "Oh, boy, I'm a fiscal conservative but, or except when it comes to A, B, C, D, E, F, and G."

Some people never met a Federal program they did not like, and the bigger they are the better they are.

I think there are a lot of farmers who wonder what we are doing. We are still trying to get a budget resolution. The distinguished chairman has given us accurate numbers and I have some other numbers to place in the RECORD with reference to the costs of different options. I would urge the people who are not going to take the budget seriously to vote against it today. Do not vote for it and then come back 2 months later and say, "Oh, well, I didn't mean it as far as agriculture. I wanted to get the mileage back home that I voted for the budget, but I really didn't mean it for agriculture."

And do not try to pick out some defense weapon and say, "Well, if you just do away with that we can put more in the farm program."

The distinguished Senator from Illinois, who brought that up earlier, voted for the conference report on defense the other day. I assume there is some money in there for Illinois. If we did away with all that money we could do a lot for the farm program. So we can all play those kinds of games: just do something over here and put it in the farm program and that will be the answer.

The problem is the farmer needs some assistance and he needs it in the marketplace. He needs it in exports. I believe there is a lot of good bipartisan work that has gone into the farm bill, led by the distinguished chairman and the distinguished ranking Democrat, Senator ZORINSKY. There have been a lot of good ideas from both sides of the aisle.

In the export area, I think it is largely the work of the distinguished Senator from Montana, and others. The farm credit area is a tough one that we have not reached yet. But in nearly every title, it has been a bipartisan effort.

But when we get down to the nitty-gritty on how much are we going to break the budget by, then it becomes political because there is a feeling around here that to be on top in agriculture you have to spend more money and whoever spends the most is going to get the most votes. That may be true; I doubt it. I hope not, because we are prepared to spend a lot of money in agriculture. We have to spend a lot of money. But we cannot do it all through Government subsidies. It has to come from the marketplace. It has to come from export promotion. It has to come from other sound programs like the Conservation Reserve, which is another bipartisan program. No one quarreled about the Conservation Reserve Program. Some of us think it ought to be larger, but nobody thinks it should not be in the farm bill.

We have some commodities that have different problems. Cotton is a different commodity. I think the cotton people pretty well have their program together. Rice is a different commodity, wheat is a different commodity, corn is a different commodity. The soybean producers want to be left alone. They are doing fairly well without the Government, thank you, seems to be their message.

We have the hog people who want a little checkoff, and the cattle people. The honey people; the wool people, where the support prices are twice the market price. I think it is pretty much the same in honey, and even the bees are laughing about that.

There is one guy in North Dakota, according to the GAO report, who received $720,000 from his honey operation—a family farmer. This is real honey, $720,000 in Federal payments. But we do not want to put any payment limitation on somebody like that, because that would damage the family farmer. We have put together all of these programs under the guise of helping the family farmer.

So I think when this bill comes to the floor we ought to start right off with the payment limitation amendment and see how many people want to help the family farmer. It ought to apply to wheat, it ought to apply to corn, it ought to apply to rice, it ought to apply to cotton, it ought to apply to wool, and it ought to apply to honey, and it ought to apply to dairy where the costs are out of control and every other commodity where the taxpayers are paying the bill and other farmers are paying the bill. If we resolve that issue, then we can move on to others.

I remember somebody mentioned flexible parity a while ago. That is a great idea, not because I thought of it, because I did not think of it. A group of farmers told me about it. That year we passed out three farm bills. As I said yesterday, the one Senator Talmadge passed out was the one that passed. But we passed out three farm bills, bipartisan.

I hope, in the final analysis, this does not become a debate on how many Republicans can hang or how many Democrats we can hang in the Senate. Because if we did that, the only ones that are going to hang are the farmers. There will not be any farm bill, or if there is, it is going to be so politicized it will be vetoed.

There was a Cabinet meeting at the White House earlier on agriculture, not just on commodities, but on farm credit and cargo preference, which are also very important to the American farmer.

So I guess what I am suggesting today is maybe during the recess all of us who have a little of our partisan juices flowing from time to time—and we all have—should go out and visit with a farmer or two, pick out a Republican and pick out a Democrat. Maybe we would find out that when we come back we ought to back off the "who can spend the most money techniques" and "I want to protect farm income"—those are great slogans—and come back and put some legislation together that will have a conservation reserve component, that will have a good export promotion component, and that will have a good farm credit component.

As I said, I am perfectly willing, to make everybody happy, to say, "OK, we will just forget about the vote yesterday. There was not any vote. There was not any 9-to-8 vote for a 2-year freeze, so it is wide open."

When we come back—and the House is coming back as well, since they decided they could not complete action either—perhaps we could complete action in a bipartisan way. If that is not the case, then I do not know what I can advise the chairman on bringing a bill to the Senate floor, because September, October, and November are going to be very busy months.

I believe we are going to get a budget resolution passed this afternoon. If that is the case, the committees have until September 27 to put together their reconciliation packages. That will take all the time of the committees to fit everything into the budget resolution. We are going to pass that. Then we are going to have other legislation that follows, and by that time it will be October.

We ought to keep in mind as we look at the options we have that we are looking at tax reform, some of the balanced budget amendments, some of the other things we have scheduled, and I guess it would take at least a week or 10 days on a farm bill unless we can have a bipartisan agreement of some kind.

Finally, Mr. President, I would like to include in the RECORD much of the information that has already been suggested by or stated by the distinguished chairman on the cost because we set aside this time to talk about the cost. All the bills are expensive. We have some who are under the impression they are not expensive. They are going to have to be expensive. As I said yesterday, in the 4 Carter years, the price support programs cost $20 billion. In the 4 Reagan years, the first 4, it jumped to $63 billion—tripled, three times as much. I assume it is going to be even more now.

If you start off with one program he talked about with a 5-percent cut starting in 1986, the 6-year cost of that program is $68 billion; 1-year freeze, 6-year cost is $79 billion; a 1-year freeze with commodities in 1987, 6-year cost is $79 billion; a 2-year freeze, 6-year cost is $85 billion; 4-year freeze, the cost is $95 billion; a 4-year freeze with commodities in 1988 and 1989 is $96.5 billion. That is a rather expensive farm bill. It seems to me that we have to face up to the realities. We can all find things in any program we would rather not spend money on and put it in agriculture, put it in education or put it in programs for the handicapped or for the disadvantaged or the low-income people. But it does not work that way. I believe the real answer is going to lie in having, as I said, a vote of 13-to-4 in the committee or 12-to-5, or even better, and then we can come to the floor with a bipartisan package, and live within the budget resolution that we hope to pass later on this afternoon.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. DOLE. I am happy to yield to my friend from Montana.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank the majority leader for yielding.

I want to be clear on a point that was presented in the Democratic caucus. the proposal seemed to be a conference agreement, or non-conference agreement, that there be $7.9 billion of reconciled cuts for the farm programs. I believe that the chairman of the committee stated it accurately when he said that would mean about $38 billion for the 3 years. It would result in the necessary budget outlay of $38 billion for the 3 years. Was our understanding in our caucus correct?

Mr. DOLE. I think that is correct as far as the $38 billion. As I understand, the savings target is going to be about $11.9 billion, but the $7.9 billion is the reconciled figure.

Mr. MELCHER. Yes.

Mr. DOLE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MELCHER. My understanding, and I will ask the majority leader, under the House committee which has a very similar proposal as we have for the next 3 years, we are within $2 to $3 billion of being within that figure?

Mr. DOLE. I am not certain which baseline they used, whether they used the July revised estimates or January's on the House side.

Mr. MELCHER. I recognize there may be some differences there. That is why we have to know what the assumptions are. But I have been instructed—I do not know whether it is accurate or not, and it may be hearsay—that we are very close to getting in there.

Might I say I commend the majority leader for having this discussion. I commend him for his statement in addition to that. I also commend his willingness to try to come together on it so that we do not come out of that committee with a 9-8 vote, but that we come out with a 12-5 or 13-4 or something, a resounding vote. But I do believe we are getting close on the budget figures. I am more optimistic than the majority leader at this point.

Mr. HARKIN. Will the majority leader yield?

Mr. DOLE. Let me indicate I hope that is correct. I hope we have enough flexibility in the budget to put it together. We have the seeds of compromise although we may have some differences. There are a lot of people who have fairly similar ideas on what we should do. We get torn apart when we start reciting figures. That is why we have directed the USDA to sit down in the next 7 to 10 days and let us all know during the recess just what their final estimates are on costs. We have too many numbers. We have CBO numbers. We have USDA numbers. We have OMB numbers, and January and July numbers. I defy anybody to write that way. I apologize to those who have to write these stories when you have about five sets of numbers to deal with and have to tell somebody out in Russell, what we are doing back here on the farm bill. But I say to the distinguished Senator from Montana that I am sincere. If there is any feeling that somehow there is an advantage because of the vote yesterday, I would be very happy if the chairman would convene a meeting for that purpose—to vitiate the vote so nobody has the "recess advantage." There is not any political advantage. Then perhaps when we come back in September we would be in a better position to try to get together and maybe even some of us can get together in August.

Mr. HARKIN. Will the majority leader yield?

Mr. DOLE. I am happy to yield.

Mr HARKIN. I thank the distinguished majority leader for yielding.

I hope over the recess that the majority leader, and perhaps, hopefully, your staff would take a look at the Wharton work done on econometrics. I spoke with the majority leader in private about it the other evening. I was told also you not only take a look at that, but at what they are talking about in terms of the macroeconomic effects of what we are doing here. Perhaps we can get focused a little better not just on the individual farmer, whether it is Kansas or Iowa, being driven off the farm but what is going to happen throughout the economy as a result of the actions that we take here.

So I commend the majority leader. And I also ask if the distinguished majority leader would perhaps help or assist in trying to get the new Director of OMB, who I guess is coming in this month, and his staff to sit down with the people who did this study, and perhap get someone else from the White House to sit down with them to go over it. I would like to know if they have any arguments with the Wharton study.

I would like to know if they have any problems with their figures and how they arrived at some of their conclusions. So perhaps the fact that we did not get to this vote may be very helpful in coming back in September to having take a look at it. I guess I have the question: Would the majority leader's office assist in getting the OMB and the White House to sit down with those who did this Wharton study?

Mr. DOLE. I thank the distinguished Senator from Iowa for calling this to my attention, as he did yesterday. We have since been able to acquire copies. I think it is an excellent idea. It is a study that should be looked at. I just instructed staff to try to put that together.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. BOREN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NICKLES). The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I listened with interest to the comments made by the distinguished majority leader. Let me say that I think people in the country would wish we would all quit making comments on the floor, go back to the Agriculture Committee, and go to work because the farmers in this country who are in desperate economic straits do not care which political party has any advantage in the recess.

Let me say that advantage is going to be an advantage to no one as we have more and more people going into bankruptcy. I wish we would quit commenting on the Senate floor, go back to the Agriculture Committee, and go to work.

I also do not intend to make any comments about any proposals made by the Senator from Kansas because I do not think that would be helpful to the discussion even though he has by implication made comments in my interest to target income of the family farmers. I made comments about the Senator from Kansas in committee yesterday. I commend him for having the courage to offer a budget proposal to the President which the President has rejected which would have enabled us to look at 100 percent of the income, not rule off limits income to this Government and 85 percent of the spending, not rule off limits defense and entitlements. Then we might be able to do something to get the budget proposal down.

The only comments I have to make by reference to the Senator from Kansas is trying to compliment him to try to develop a budget package that would make some sense and really do something to get the deficits down without putting unfair advantage on any one particular sector.

Mr. President, I do not apologize to the Senator from Kansas or anyone else for saying that as far as I am concerned my mission in the Agriculture Committee is to try to do something to help the family farmer. I do not apologize for 1 minute for trying to direct the target for more of the moneys paid to the family units. I am shocked and astounded that the Senator from Kansas would be opposed to trying to target benefits so that we pay a higher price on the first 20,000 bushels of wheat produced than we pay on the next many thousands of bushels produced.

We have to consider what it takes the family-size farm to survive. I hope we can quit paying so much to huge operators so that we can finally allow the family farm income to have enough cash flow to survive.

Let me say while I have voted, and the record is very clear, for budgets on this floor, including the Hollings-Chiles-Nunn proposal, which was the only proposal which would have brought us to the balanced budget by the year 1988, which did touch the so-called sacred cows, I do think we also have to consider equity in any budget we pass and have and use common sense.

The greatest danger to this economy in the short-run, along with the overriding danger posed by deficits in both the budget area and trade deficits as well, is that we are going to collapse one critical sector in this economy and by doing so we are going to cause turmoil in the banking system and eventually have a domino effect on the whole economy.

Agriculture is one of those sectors where the danger is extreme right now. We are going to be irresponsible, in my opinion, if we do not pass a bill that does enough to get the income level and the cash flow for the average-size family farm up to a level that we will not have so much land on the market that we collapse land values and threaten the stability of the banking system not only in the farm belt but all across this country before we are through.

Some of us met in the last 2 or 3 days with representatives of the farm credit system. They are concerned with falling land values at a rate that is truly alarming, harking back to the days of the late 1920's. As I mentioned yesterday in committee, land values in my State have fallen 20 percent since January. I do not think there is a single person in this country who reads the newspapers who cannot understand that if you continue to have deflation of a basic unit of value, that stands behind and secures billions of dollars of credit in this country in the banking system, if you continue to have a 38-percent deflation on an annual basis, that that does not eventually cast a threat to the entire economy of this country and the financial system of this country. We would absolutely be closing our eyes to the facts if we do not believe that.

We also have a continuing decline in land value which serves as a basic unit of value behind much credit in this country, well over $200 billion of credit. At the same time, we have the farm credit system in a situation where as more and more units are experiencing more and more members are unable to service the debt, the interest rate is raised on those remaining members to keep the system afloat. That interest rate is up to 13 percent for the farmers, even though the Government is paying only 7 percent for the money.

How long are we going to let this go on? How long will we close our eyes to the dire threat of this proposal?

We talked to the credit experts this week and they said, "We have no hope to stabilize land values, to keep them from continuing to decline at an alarming rate. To stabilize the farm credit system will take an increase in cash flow to the family farm, an increase in net income, of between 10 to 20 percent in the next year."

We have been struggling over a bill with pencil and paper that at the most increases net farm income the first year about 6 percent on the average size family farm.

That is barely the margin enough to hold the situation together. If we allow that level to decline over the next 3 years by 5 percent a year, it is very easy to see we are going to be in a negative situation by the third year, not even doing as well as we are now.

If that happens, we are going to have enough trouble in the financial system, let me say, that we would think an investment of $5 billion or $6 billion right now in family farm income would be a tremendous bargain compared to the multibillion dollars of damage that the Congress will have to come in and repair if we allow this situation to happen.

The question has been raised about payment limitations and I think this can be very misleading. I urge my colleagues from Kansas to listen to these figures. I urge him over the recess to examine the figures on payment limitations that he just gave.

I just costed out exactly what he talked about with the $20,000 payment limitation.

You would think to hear the discussion we were guaranteeing farmers an income of $20,000 or $50,000. That is not so. We are talking about a gross payment.

I took a 400-acre cotton farm. Assuming the average yield was 600 pounds per acre, which is what the Department says it is, roughly, and you take the program proposed in the Agriculture Committee right now, on a 400-acre cotton farm—which is not a huge farm; I would call it a family-size farm—you are going to get gross deficiency payments of $53,000 plus an additional loan on production of $10,000.

You would cut that back to $20,000?

You can see what you have done to the income of a family-size farm.

Let us take an 800-acre wheat farm. And I might say I am not a bit ashamed to try to target enough of our farm program to get the income up on a family-size wheat farm. Again, I would ask the majority leader to listen to this particular figure because I think it will be of interest to him. I am using a 38.8 bushel yield, which is the average figure. We are talking about the average-size family wheat farm in a State like Kansas or Oklahoma. The deficiency payment under this particular program would be $34,936 in addition to loan protection payments under the bill he is talking about, and an additional $14,361.60. That is a total of $49,297.60 gross.

It is not a huge farm. We are talking about an 800-acre wheat farm.

Let us reduce that to a maximum gross payment of $20,000. That cuts the income of an 800-acre wheat farmer in Oklahoma and Kansas by approximately 17 percent, a 17-percent drop in income for the average family size farm.

Seventy percent of all those family size wheat farms in Oklahoma right now have a negative cash flow. Land values have dropped 19 percent. Interest rates under the farm credit system are up to 13 percent. We are in a cycle and better stop before it is too late.

Certainly, as one Senator I want to see us look at these figures again before we cut the net income for an 800-acre wheat farm by 17 percent. If we do, we are not going to have any farmers to worry about. We will not even need to debate the farm program on the floor of the U.S. Senate in another year.

I would just say that I think we can go back to work, we should go back to work. There are honest differences of opinion. I hope we can work in that spirit. As I said in the committee yesterday, I have great respect for the chairman. He has never misled anyone about his view. We have some difference of opinion. We are certainly in agreement about the deficit. We have some difference of opinion about where the priority should be. But he has never misled anyone.

I respect the majority leader and the effort he has made to get a fair budget proposal accepted by the White House. He has stuck his neck out further than almost anyone else in this city trying to get a statesmanlike and fair approach adopted by people in both parties on the budget. He has succeeded in one great goal. We have been trying to get TIP O'NEILL and the President together. They finally got together.

It was not the way it was intended or hoped for. I hope we can get them back apart, maybe, if we can get a little progress and then get them back together on something like the Senator from Kansas suggested to obtain some progress.

We have a crisis. We need to go back and get to work on the Agriculture Committee. We do not have any time to waste. I think maybe some people on our side would be ready to submit to a 5-minute time limitation on any section of the committee bill, go ahead and finish the food stamp section, finish the farm credit section, finish the whole commodity section, and get it out.

But I say again we are going to make a very, very serious mistake if we act in the committee and the Senate acts to pass a bill on the floor that does not address the problems of farm credit, does not try to get the income up on the average-sized farm unit significantly over where it is now so we can save those farm units.

I certainly do not want to allow hundreds of thousands of dollars in payment to gigantic farm units. I have led the fight to target the support payments we make so we pay a higher rate on the first 40,000 bushels of wheat than we do on the next 40,000 and less on the next, and so on.

We have to be very careful as we struggle with payment limitations that we make it very clear that we are talking about gross, not net, payments and we have to be very careful to sit down and calculate the impact on the average-sized family farm unit before we take the step to jump off the cliff and lower the average family farm income—not the income of huge farms, not the income of the industrial farms, but the average-sized family farm. We cannot afford it.

As I said, this is the last speech I intend to make on the floor until the Agriculture Committee has sent a bill to the floor for us to act upon. I hope we will go back to the committee very shortly to do our talking there, mainly do our voting there and get a bill out here that we can pass.

I hope we will adopt a rule in the committee or on the floor that none of us will belittle the proposals of anybody else. I think to say we are concerned about family farm income is not a political slogan. It is a matter of heartfelt political conviction. I give the benefit of that doubt to the sincerity of everybody who sits on the other side of the aisle, and I hope everybody who sits on the other side of the aisle will give the same benefit of the doubt to me and my colleagues on this side.

We are trying to fight for stability and support not only for the farmer but for everybody in this economy. As the Senator from Iowa said a moment ago in citing the Wharton study, the rest of the country had better wake up to the facts. If you think this banking system is immune from a deflationary collapse of land values to secure billions of dollars of loans, you had better go back and read the introductory paragraphs of the Economics 101 textbook and reexamine your position on economics.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I have listened with great interest to the remarks by many of my colleagues, including the detailed analysis of the situation just outlined by my colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN]. I say to all my colleagues that they have spoken with prudence, they have spoken with diligence, and they have spoken with an understanding of what the problem is in agriculture today; not only in agriculture, but in all of rural America and all of the small businesses who are so closely associated with agriculture that everything we are saying here today applies directly to them.

Mr. President, almost a year ago, I came to the Senate floor to offer an amendment to a supplemental appropriations bill. The amendment was in the form of a resolution which urged "The President in cooperation with the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System * * * to assure that an adequate flow of credit be available to American farmers at reasonable rates and that the American farmers be treated no less favorably than foreign borrowers with comparable levels of risk."

I offered that resolution because I was struck by the contrast between the credit treatment of American farmers and foreign borrowers. At that time, the external debt of Venezuela, Brazil, Argentina, and Mexico were roughly equal to the total indebtedness of the American farmer. Yet the way the Federal Government handled each situation was anything but equal.

Although my sense-of-the-Congress resolution was unanimously adopted by the Senate, incorporated into the final version of the supplemental appropriations bill and signed into law, the disparity continues. When foreign borrowers face an inability to pay their debts, massive bailouts and loan restructuring schemes are designed to prevent even one default. When American farmers face a temporary inability to pay their obligations, primarily through no fault of their own, emergency credit legislation is vetoed and a market-oriented farm policy is presented to Congress.

Recently, the contrast between the treatment of farm borrowers and foreign borrowers was again highlighted. Pursuant to a variable interest rate formula, the World Bank, which receives 20 percent of its support from the U.S. taxpayer, just announced that the interest rate charged to developing countries would be lowered from 9.29 to 8.82 percent.

A few weeks prior to the World Bank announcement, the Omaha district of the Farm Credit System announced that its interest rates would increase from 12¾ to 13½ percent.

What in the world are our priorities?

The World Bank announcement is great news for Third World nations. It means that they will have an opportunity to lessen their debt burden. However, the American farmer is in as much need of favorable credit treatment as any Third World nation.

When the international banking system faced difficulty, the President enthusiastically embraced an $8.4 billion increase in U.S. contributions to the International Monetary Fund. Now the Federal farm credit system is experiencing difficulty and the administration is moving in slow motion to even discuss a rescue plan.

I have come to this floor dozens of times to discuss the economic crisis in rural America. I am here again to say that the situation is not improving and that major Federal action is needed.

I am beginning to think that the only way American farmers can get appropriate assistance from their Government is to form their own Third World nation. It could be called farmlandia. Then large international banks and multilateral lending institutions would line up to dole out cash to farmers. If there were ever a problem of repayment, the U.S. Treasury would then rush to the assistance of farmlandia.

But they cannot help the farmers because they are not a Third World nation.

Mr. President, it is time that the Federal Government got its priorities straight. We must put the needs of Americans first. Time after time, the Federal Government has come to the assistance of foreign borrowers or their lending institutions. Now the American farmer needs our help.

In the coming days, I am hopeful that the Congress will extend a helping hand to the American farmer through the approval of a farm bill that will lead rural America down a path toward prosperity. I also look forward to an administrative or, if necessary, a legislative solution to the crisis which cripples the farm credit system.

Alan L. Thober of Beatrice, NE, recently had a letter published in the Grand Island Independent newspaper and I shall ask that it be printed in the RECORD in its entirety. In it he notes the words of Daniel Webster. The Senate would do well to note those words. Webster said, "Let us never forget that the cultivation of the Earth is the most important labor of man. Unstable is the future of that country which has lost its taste for agriculture. If there is one lesson in history that is unmistakable, it is that national strength lies very near the soil."

Mr. President, the time for action is now.

I ask unanimous consent to have the article I mentioned printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Grand Island Independent, July 22, 1985]

DISTURBED BY FARM POLICIES

(By Alan L. Thober)

To the EDITOR:

A year has passed since I first received a copy of the President's program for the elimination of the family farmer from his deputy administrator. Some will remember my feeble efforts to influence the election through letters that were printed in various local newspapers, state and national magazines. The majority of farmers still voted in favor of the man that had already driven the first nail into the coffin of agriculture.

The futility of not believing the President's intentions has been demonstrated many times in the destruction of hundreds of family farms, the insolvency of dozens of ag-related banking institutions, hundreds of independent businesses and the severe problems of this nation's largest agricultural lender. The President's program is extremely simple and horrendously effective. It calls for the lowering of all market prices on major commodities through government manipulation until such time as the heartland of America is insolvent. To negate the President's influence and that of the three most powerful men in determining administrative policy, Senators Robert Dole and Jesse Helms, and the Farm Bureau's Robert Delano, hundreds of little publicized meetings have been held throughout this nation.

In attendance were governors, congressmen, senators, farmers and representatives of the grain trade and at least 22 farm organizations. It was clear from the beginning that if agriculture was to survive as a vital industry an entirely new direction must be taken. The direction chosen was a mandatory program based on bushel allotments that would produce food only for markets that allowed opportunity for profit. It would trim some $12 billion from the federal budget, retire for the use of future generations some 20 million acres of highly erodable land, reduce all surplus commodities to an amount needed for emergency and a host of contingencies beneficial to America and its largest industry.

On May 20, 1985, I received from the same source, Deputy Administrator Ray F. Volkil, a letter with an enclosure bearing the name and seal of the United States Department of Agriculture, revealing the reasons why the Reagan Administration will not support the program that is the concensus of the agriculture industry; 1. Farmer profits would be substantially higher. 2. Consumers would pay more for food. 3. Land prices would increase. 4. Farmers would continue owning the land.

The President perhaps has never read the words of Daniel Webster "Let us never forget that the cultivation of the earth is the most important labor of man. Unstable is the future of that country which has lost its taste for agriculture. If there is one lesson in history that is unmistakeable, it is that national strength lies very near the soil."

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I guess what I am trying to get at here is that we seem to have our priorities all mixed up. I have heard figures thrown about here on the floor today indicating that we were trying to create a grandiose scheme of welfare, if you will, for the wealthy farmers. That is the farthest possible thing from the truth.

I have also heard remarks made that the less informed might assume that those of us who are trying to have a workable, pared-down effort for agriculture in their greatest time of need since the depression of the 1930's are somehow wild-eyed spenders. Let us talk about the latest budget figures that have just come out. I assume that the leadership on that side of the aisle has endorsed these because they are key parts of the budget compromise that we are now awaiting, patiently or otherwise, to come forth with an agreement between the House and the Senate Budget Committees.

The facts of the matter are that while the administration wanted a 40-percent cut in 3 years for agricultural programs, this latest plan incorporates a 22-percent cut. Mr. President, that 22-percent cut in agricultural programs that we are about ready to adopt in here, and many of us will be voting for that reluctantly, I presume, is one of the largest percentage cuts of any item in the budget. You would be led to believe, if you did not know to the contrary, that we were making no sacrifices whatsoever.

No, by and large, the budget proposal, which is not a good one, is a freeze across the board, except in national defense. National defense is not cut a penny. National defense gets full steam ahead, what they got before plus an inflationary increase on top of that. Many other programs, many of them worthy, are simply frozen.

Agriculture is taking and is scheduled to take one of the largest percentage cuts in the budget. That point should be made clear.

Also, I am almost shocked to hear some of my colleagues essentially get up and say that the more we cut farm programs, the better it is for the farmer.

Now, the farmers of America do not believe that, as much as they would like to get Government out of agriculture. This is not a welfare program we are talking about. It is a program that is designed to help the family-sized farmers now going broke in record numbers over the tide, if you will—this tide of despair that is engulfing not only them but the economies of rural America. How bad is it going to get? I do not know, Mr. President. But I know that the futures markets are kicking off numbers out there that have been, for the last 2 weeks, down, down, down, with agricultural prices.

It is now clear on the futures market that we are going to have wheat cash prices below $3 a bushel and we are going to have corn cash prices at or below $2 a bushel.

Now, anyone who knows anything about agriculture knows that you cannot begin to keep even the wolf's puppy away from the door with that kind or price. It may not be the Government's responsibility to set prices, but what is the difficulty our farmers face today and who caused it? Not the farmers primarily. No, it is the policies of their government and the policies of governments around the world. The overvalued dollar has not only wrecked our steel industry and many of our major smokestack industries but it has literally devastated agriculture in rural America.

Mr. HARKIN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. EXON. I will be happy to yield. I yield to my friend from Iowa.

Mr. HARKIN. I thank the distinguished Senator from Nebraska for yielding. He is absolutely right. I said earlier on the floor of the Senate that it was the irresponsibility of Congress that cause the farmers' problems. The Senator from Nebraska has said that, too. In 1981, we had the Gramm-Latta budget, we had the tax cuts for the wealthy and we had this huge increase in defense spending—three of the most irresponsible things this Congress has ever done. And then we heard it said that these huge deficits have to be reduced, and it has been built up.

Well, the deficit, when President Reagan took office, was $932 billion. Today, that deficit is $1.8 trillion. This President has doubled the Federal deficit. And as the Senator from Nebraska correctly points out, it is that which is overvaluing the dollar, increasing the interest rates to our farmers. The misguided, the totally misguided policies of this administration have brought agriculture to its knees. The other thing I point out—and again the Senator from Nebraska was right on the mark talking about $2 corn and $3 wheat—I think this administration forgets the farmers do pay income taxes; that when those farmers do not make money, they will not be paying taxes and the deficit will go up even more. So if you want to get this economy back on track again, get the farm income back up and that will do it. If you keep driving the farm income down, the deficit is going to keep going up.

I thank the Senator. I wanted to point out from where most of the deficits have come. They have come in the last 4 years under the Reagan administration. This administration has had more deficits in its 4 years than the Presidents from George Washington to Jimmy Carter combined. That is what has ruined our economy, these huge budget deficits, piled up by this administration, doubling from $932 billion to $1.8 trillion in 4 years. The Senator from Nebraska is absolutely right. Misguided policies of this administration are destroying agriculture and if we follow those misguided policies once again, we are going to destroy agriculture even more.

I thank the distinguished Senator for yielding me this time.

Mr. EXON. I thank my friend from Iowa for his on-point remarks.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I might yield without losing my right to the floor to the distinguished chairman of the Agriculture Committee for an announcement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Nebraska. I asked Senator EXON if he would yield to me for the purpose of announcing that if the members of the Senate Agriculture Committee are willing, it is my intent to convene the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry at 4:30 to proceed, if we can, with the marking up of the 1985 farm bill. It is the chairman's intent to lay before the committee the credit title of the farm bill. Obviously, Mr. President, it will take unanimous consent for us to do that. I am simply making note that that is my intent. It will be up to the leadership, of course, to determine whether we can receive unanimous consent to do so.

I thank the Senator from Nebraska for yielding.

Mr. EXON. I thank the chairman of the Agriculture Committee for that very, very good news. I am delighted to hear it. I am going to cut my remarks short because I do not want to do anything that might impair the ability of the members of the Agriculture Committee to be there for that very, very important meeting.

I was at this desk 24 hours ago. We were pleading then for a meeting of the Agriculture Committee. One has now been scheduled and I am just delighted to hear the good news because at least we have a chance to get on with something constructive to solve the problems at hand.

Let me finish, Mr. President, by saying in addition to all of the other difficulties that our farmers are having—we have mentioned the high value of the dollar which has literally priced our agriculture products, along with other products, out of the international marketplace—in addition to that and equally devastating is highly subsidized foreign competition that is rampant in the world today, especially with our prime trading partners, the Common Market countries and Japan. They are subsidizing their agriculture to the point it makes it extremely difficult for the American farmer.

This morning, we had a hearing before a subcommittee of the Joint Economic Committee. We had the cattle people testify that they had a devastating situation brought about among other things by the fact that there has been an increased spread in the percentage of what the farmer receives for a critter at the farm gate and what that meat costs in the supermarket. Mr. President, that has mushroomed. It used to be about a 30-percent difference between the raw, live animal and what the meat costs. That has zoomed up to 44 percent today, and we want to know the reason why.

Mr. President, there is no question that unless we can do something constructive, unless we can keep from being attacked, those of us who are going to continue to fight for a sound farm program, recognizing that we are willing to go along possibly with agricultural programs taking the largest percentage cut of any other portion of the budget—and I want to drive that fact home—with these things we hope that we can work collectively together not as partisans but as people who are concerned about the survival of the family-sized farmer. The family farmers are the ones we are primarily concerned about today, in a climate of absolute depression in agricultural America. It seems to me that the Government caused the major portion of this program with embargoes, with high interest rates, with unbelievable expanding deficits, expecially in the last 4 years, creating the high value of the dollar which devastates agriculture more than any other industry and last but not least by the highly subsidized foreign competition that we see day in and day out.

I ask again the question I asked in opening these remarks: If we can do it for Third World nations; if we can give them a break on their interest rates; if we can give them a break by extending the time of their loans; if we can refrain from putting any of them out of business, not one; if we can refrain from having our bank examiners list even one of those foreign questionable loans when they examine banks, why are the regulatory agencies today not giving our farmers the same consideration?

If the farmers could get the same interest rates as Third World countries, which probably never will have a chance of paying back the money, we might be able to work our way out of this agricultural depression a lot faster than we otherwise might.

Mr. President, I hope the committee can meet at 4:30, as outlined by the chairman a few moments ago. It could take 24 hours to do it, but late is a lot better than never. Good luck, members of the Agricultural Committee.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, the upcoming Senate debate on the 1985 farm bill will present us with an opportunity to set the course of Federal dairy policy for years to come. In view of the tremendous importance of dairy farmers and the dairy industry to my home State of Wisconsin, I want to take a few minutes today to outline to my colleagues where I think we ought to be going in this area.

I would observe first of all that dairy is more important to Wisconsin than to any other State, and more important to the upper Midwest than to any other region.

Wisconsin produces more milk and dairy products than any other State, over one-sixth of the Nation's total production. Wisconsin produces almost a quarter of the Nation's butter, and 40 percent of our cheese. Milk output in Wisconsin is almost as large as that in the next two largest dairy States combined.

Yet these statistics do not go to the heart of why dairying is so vital to Wisconsin. The fact that there are over 43,000 dairy farms in the State does.

These tens of thousands of diary farmers provide the economic foundation of rural communities across the State. We are speaking of family farmers here, according to any definition of that phrase that has ever been used. Too small to utilize the Tax Code to finance expansion, too large to offset farm losses with off-farm income, these are the mid-sized, full-time family farms whose survival and prosperity has always been one of the chief declared goals of Federal farm policy.

Dairying in Wisconsin is a $3 billion-plus industry that provides tens of thousands of jobs in processing, transportation, farm supply, and other areas. It is every bit as important to Wisconsin as corn is to Iowa, wheat to Kansas, or tobacco to North Carolina.

None of this will come as a surprise to my colleagues. I mention it to make a point I feel it vital that we all understand as we approach the debate over the dairy title of the farm bill.

The point is this: Dairy policy is almost always discussed in terms that suggest that our only proper objectives are reducing the dairy surplus and treating all the milk-producing regions of the country equitably. I submit that this focus is inappropriate.

Wisconsin dairy farmers know that the surplus must be dealt with. But they realize that sound dairy policy involves more than just reducing Government purchases under the Price-Support Program.

It involves preserving the family dairy farm, and the many rural communities that depend upon it.

It involves ensuring that the benefits of the dairy industry's amazing productivity is passed along to consumers.

Finally, it involves allowing market forces to encourage production in the most efficient dairying regions, without interference from outdated or inappropriate Government policy.

It is also long past time that we recognized that all milk-producing regions are not alike. Neither I nor any of my farm constituents bear any malice at all toward the dairy industry in Florida or other Southeastern States. But it would be bad policy—grossly inequitable policy—to treat the interests of the few hundred dairy farmers in certain Southeastern and Western States as in any way comparable to those of the many thousands of dairy farmers in Wisconsin and Minnesota.

How does the dairy title approved by the Senate Agriculture Committee address the needs of the most important dairying region in the country? Not very well.

The committee chose to adopt a provision calling for a support price freeze through 1986, with yearly reductions in the support price in each year after that, depending on the size of the dairy surplus.

This approach is better than many that have been suggested. At least it would give dairy farmers some time to plan, and avoid the absurd situation we have had this year, with policy changing every 3 months.

But it is still inadequate. Indeed, it shows a disappointing lack of imagination in an area where imagination is badly needed.

Let's look for a moment at what the Agriculture Committee's plan does not do:

It does not address the rising tide of subsidized casein imports, which displace huge quantities of domestically produced nonfat dry milk.

It does not change the sad fact that dairy, alone among the major commodity programs, makes no attempt to target program benefits to family dairy farmers.

It does not change the pointless restrictions on the pricing of reconstituted milk—restrictions that deny consumers across the country the benefit of low cost-of-production milk from the upper Midwest.

I would note here that the regulation of reconstituted milk, along with the system of class I differentials, is part of an unbelievably complex regulatory system designed to encourage local production of milk across the country. In an era when long-distance transportation of fluid milk and power for reconstitution is much easier than it used to be, what we have is a lot of regulation serving an outdated policy goal.

We do not, after all, structure farm policy to encourage the production of peanuts in Maine. As Senator BOSCHWITZ has noted. The fact that oranges and orange juice are perishable does not give us an excuse to establish marketing orders that promote orange production in New Jersey or Wisconsin.

No—We allow these products to be produced where it is economically most efficient. Why should we not do the same for dairy?

Both economic efficiency and the cause of helping the mid-sized, full-time family farmer argues for a dairy title that does more than just adjust the price support level—A dairy title that is truly market-oriented. I regret that leadership from the administration, which is always proclaiming that we need a market-oriented farm policy, has not been forthcoming on this issue. On virtually everything save the price support issue, this administration has offered a policy of inertia. The only proposal on marketing order issues that this administration has made so far is one for a study. Not to be completed for 5 years.

I would welcome a change in the administration's nonposition on these issues in time for the Senate floor debate on dairy. Much more important, I invite my colleagues to examine these issues when we discuss the dairy title, and the various amendments to it that I and other dairy State Senators will be proposing.

These are troubled times for dairy farmers in Wisconsin and across the country. No Government policy by itself can bring prosperity to the dairy industry, or keep in business every individual dairy farmer. But we can come up with a dairy proposal that frees up markets for family dairy farmers, that targets dairy program benefits to those farmers, and that will last for long enough for all dairy farmers to plan for their future.

I ask my colleagues to join me in crafting such a policy when we debate the dairy title on the Senate floor.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, as we debate the future of the farm program, it is important to keep our eye on the ball.

U.S. farm exports are declining precipitously. In the past 4 years, they declined in volume by 17.6 percent.

This decline resulted in lost sales of farm commodities and products totalling 84.3 million tons.

The value of U.S. farm exports lost since 1981 will total over $36 billion by 1986. These losses would have added $300 billion to our gross national product.

All this translates into a drastic drop in farm income, and a record number of farm bankruptcies.

Federal farm programs are important. They make sure that America's farmers are able to continue to produce the food that feeds this Nation and much of the world.

But there are other reasons for the decline in American exports, and the subsequent loss of income by American farmers.

The American dollar—driven to exhorbitantly high levels by Federal budget deficits—has robbed American producers of many of their markets.

The budget deficit itself helped propel interest rates to double-digit levels.

The administration has failed to formulate a coherent and consistent international trade policy.

Many of America's agricultural products are blocked in foreign markets by unfair trade barriers, high tariffs and foreign subsidies.

The members of Montana Grain Growers Association understand that these problems are America's farmers' worst enemy.

The MGGA recently passed a resolution that urges their members to support efforts to stabilize the value of the dollar, balance the budget and design a trade policy that will allow us to compete in world markets.

This resolution is a voice of common sense at an uncommon time. The MGGA has its eye on the ball. They understand the real problems facing the farm economy.

I commend them for the leadership they are showing.

I ask unanimous consent that the MGGA's resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MONTANA GRAIN GROWERS ASSOCIATION RESOLUTION

MGGA views with alarms the escalating budget deficit, the unprecedented trade deficit and the inferior international trading position of U.S. business and industry, of which agriculture is one of the most important. We fail to understand the lack of action by Congress and the Executive Branch to improve our position in world markets. We fail to understand why we cannot achieve sound monetary and fiscal policies. We fail to understand why we cannot design a comprehensive long term trade policy that has the power to enforce, if not a free, a fair, international trade. American agriculture is technically competent and competitive, but cannot alone compete against foreign treasuries.

The Montana Grain Growers Association looks forward to the day when our government is no longer a hindrance to our international trade, but a supporting partner—a partnership that will surely bring jobs back to the U.S. and put dollars in the pockets of U.S. farmers and workers. We must balance the budget, get the value of the dollar in line and design a trade policy that will allow us to compete in world markets, help stabilize the world economy and secure a lasting world peace.

The MGGA Board of Directors urges all state growers to support these efforts so we can look forward to the day when American agriculture again can operate without complex government programs.

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, on April 16, I introduced my first legislative proposal as a U.S. Senator, S. 908. It was, as my distinguished colleagues on the Agriculture Committee know, a farm bill endorsed by the American Farm Bureau Federation, which is now cosponsored by 10 Members of this body. I said in my floor statement accompanying the introduction of S. 908, that no single farm proposal of the some 16 considered by the Senate Agriculture Committee would be adopted in its entirety. And it appears that the bill which will eventually be reported to the full Senate will indeed be the product of earnest compromise and concessions from Senators on both sides of the agricultural debate. It also appears that the committee compromise proposal will bear a strong resemblance to the bill I understand.

We need some common sense in agricultural policy, Mr. President, because what we are doing just is not working. No less an expert than Joseph Kinney, who has served as an adviser on agricultural affairs to former Senators Hubert Humphrey and Robert Morgan publicly advocates, as he calls it, a "full production agriculture."

"American agriculture must be allowed to operate in a manner which utilizes the technological advantages which are available only to America's producers," said Mr. Kinney in an article he authored for the Wall Street Journal.

I cannot agree more. For far too long, Mr. President, we have been guided by agricultural policy which was drafted to meet the needs of American agriculture when 60 million citizens called farming their primary occupation. When the farm policy that is the basis for current policy was initiated in 1933, American farmers could not even produce enough to meet domestic needs. In the 1970's, with general farm policy as it was in 1933, American farmers could not produce enough to keep up with ever-expanding foreign markets. Times are far different now and I think that we must recognize and deal with the circumstances as they now exist. Mr. President, I think that Mr. Kinney makes a good case for a new approach to agricultural policy and I think this kind of innovative thinking is long overdue.

The arguments for a mandatory production control program have been very persuasively put forth by the Senator from Iowa, Senator HARKIN, and are supported by a number of farmers in my State. But a majority of the farmers and agri-businesses in Kentucky are very much afraid of a mandatory control program. Studies from various sources have indeed shown that farm income will increase in the first year under Senator HARKIN's approach. But the same studies have shown that within 2 years, you will begin to see a drastic drop in exports of U.S. farm commodities. And farm implement and supply dealers who have borne the brunt of the current farm crisis along with the farmers will be driven right out of business. Within a 5-year period, Kentucky and America's farmers will again be producing only for a domestic market and the corresponding drop in farm income caused by the massive reduction in farm exports will doubtless lead American agriculture right down the primrose path to a depression. I just do not believe we want to do that.

The farm bill which will be reported out of the Senate Agriculture Committee will be a bipartisan bill, although just barely. It is no consensus, because none of us know just how to deal effectively with the problems of American agriculture. The distinguished Senator from Oklahoma, Senator BOREN, pointed out yesterday land prices in his State were declining at a rate of 38 percent annually, but in my own State of Kentucky, USDA estimates show that land values have decreased by less than 5 percent in 1985. We have a very real problem here because, the depth of the crisis facing Oklahoma farmers is somewhat different from the problems of the Kentucky farmer. It is very difficult to write a good farm bill under these conditions. The fact that we are dealing with a very real budget problem only complicates matters further.

Even though tobacco is Kentucky's leading cash crop, I must point out that Kentucky is 14th in the United States in soybean and corn production and is 12th overall in production of major U.S. farm export commodities. Farming is a $3 billion cash business in Kentucky. And I am convinced it could be even more if we could truly unleash the power of Kentucky agriculture.

We simply cannot unleash that power by idling up to 50 percent of our farmland and sending a clear signal to our competitors on the world market that American farmers are going to get out of the export business, as would happen in a mandatory control program. Contrary to what my friend from Montana may say, USDA does have an export policy—but this policy is worthless if our commodities are so overpriced that my Kentucky farmers are producing for Government storage instead of foreign buyers. A responsible export policy depends on responsible farm policy and I think we are slowly moving in the right direction.

Mr. President, as happens occasionally in this body, politics get in the way of policy. But all of us, on both sides of the aisle, are singing from the same page of the hymnbook, as the distinguished chairman of the Agriculture Committee might say. We want to make agriculture profitable again, we want to establish policy that will stabilize land prices, we want to put the American farmer back on equal footing with farmers from other parts of the world. And we can do it.

We must give our farmers the opportunity to do what they do best: use American farm technology to produce commodities more efficiently than any other farmer anywhere in the world. And with sound, cohesive, long-term farm policy we can use this farm bill as the vehicle to make it happen.

APPROACHING THE 1985 FARM BILL

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, as the 99th Congress undertakes the vital task of constructing the most important and yet most difficult farm bill in the recent history of farm legislation, I want to offer my thoughts on how we can accomplish this formidable task within the parameters of clear and sound economic and social policy.

There is certainly good reason for the concern that all of us share over the future of the American farm community, and specifically, the family farm. The family farm, which began as a means of subsistence for millions of Americans during the first century and a half of this country's existence, has during the last 50 years developed into this Nation's largest industry and the primary supplier of food for the world.

The American farm community long ago shed its image as a small, simple sector of our society. Along with the input, processing, transportation and distribution industries which support it, agriculture has become this country's largest employer, requiring the services of over 20 million workers to produce and sell our farm products. Farm assets totaled $1.03 trillion on January 1, 1984, an amount equal to about 70 percent of the capital assets of all manufacturing corporations in the total United States. As a measure of our tremendous productivity, realize that today, one American farmer, the most efficient in the world, supplies enough food to feed 79 people.

Because of this tremendous productivity, we all enjoy a wide variety of inexpensive food. But the benefits of American agriculture extend far beyond our shores. In 1984, we exported over one-third of our aggregate crop production. To the credit of our farmers, the United States, thus far in 1985, has contributed to drought-stricken Africa over 3,076,260 metric tons of food assistance, valued at over $1 billion. Of course, this level of help would not be possible without the outstanding productivity of the American farmer.

The farm sector and the jobs that crop and livestock production create are especially important to the middle west, and to my State of Indiana. While Indiana leads the Nation in the production of steel and prides itself as a manufacturing State, agriculture remains the lifeblood of its economy. Ranked eighth overall in the value of farm produce sold, Indiana is rated near the top in corn, hog and soybean production. Poultry, eggs, popcorn, tobacco and wheat are also important to our State's economy.

Today, family farm operators big and small, old and new, with diverse management styles, are finding it difficult, if not impossible, to realize a profitable return from an investment in American agriculture, I would suggest several factors that have contributed to this alarming set of circumstances, as I think it important to isolate and understand the causes of our problems before we suggest solutions to them.

Sound farm policy must accurately reflect the uniqueness of agriculture as a business enterprise and its important interrelationship with our overall economy. The 1985 farm bill should authorize a program that will serve the long-run interests of the American food and fiber industry; a farm policy designed to foster long-term prosperity in American agriculture and based upon our farm operators' ability to realize a profitable return from the marketplace, not the U.S. Treasury. At the same time, we need a farm bill that will maintain a strong and stable domestic agricultural base, and thereby preserve both our economic strength and reasonable social stability, so that we may always meet our own food and fiber needs.

But before exploring how to achieve this objective, let us briefly review the many factors which have contributed to the difficult condition of American agriculture.

First of all, our capital intensive farm economy, sensitive to both interest costs and export volume, has, over the past couple of years, quite predictably, adjusted to prolonged high real interest rates as well as disadvantageous exchange rates. It has done so by moving asset values downward to a level consistent with current commodity prices and the revenues which these prices can produce. In short, the current farm economy cannot provide a return on asset values pushed well above reasonable levels by the high inflation periods of the late 1970's, and as a result, land and other farm asset values are declining.

Second, agricultural land values, from which critical operating and long-term financing are drawn, have tumbled to reflect this economic adjustment. disinflation in the farm environment has spurred a drastic realignment of our overcapitalized farm asset base. The estimated value of total farm assets increased from approximately $502.6 billion in 1975 to over $1.0456 trillion 1983, while during the same period total farm indebtedness increased from $81.6 billion to over $216.3 billion. This reflects the heavy increase in agricultural investment during the last half of the 1970's, but the pendulum has swung back toward more realistic and sustainable asset values during the 1980's. In my State of Indiana, land values on average have fallen over 21 percent during the last year, seriously restricting the ability of farm operators to borrow against such declining security, seriously undermining farm equity.

A decline in asset values of this magnitude is having serious repercussions in this Nation's banking system. As we consider means to stabilize our farm economy, we should not lose sight of the fact that in so doing we are addressing larger problems in our banking establishment that affect all Americans without regard to occupation.

Third, past farm programs, evolving under much the same structure since the 1930's, have introduced distorting and damaging incentives into the marketplace. These have encouraged overproduction, here and abroad, and excessive investment of capital into the production of farm produce; produce for which in many instances there is no market. How has this happened?

How? The current structure of our loan rates and target prices give the farm operator a higher price for his commodity bushel than he would otherwise receive from the market. Producers respond by increasing production, causing surpluses and further depressing prices. this vicious circle continues, requiring additional income support, forcing farmers to attempt to produce more in order to realize an equivalent gain for lower prices, and so forth.

The distorting effects of our farm programs impact the world market in a different manner. Developing agricultural economies around the world are often able to produce agricultural produce at costs lower than our most recent loan rates. Because our loan rates set minimum prices in the United States, foreign competitors can be assured a market for their production so long as it is sold below U.S. loan rates. Our increasing loan rates have encouraged other nations, such as Brazil, Agrentina, China, and Australia to increase their production, contributing both to already high grain surpluses and heightened world competition.

Forth, we must not forget that the economy of the 1980's is much different from the economy of the 1970's. As is evident to anyone who has studied the agricultural industry, changes in variables such as exchange, inflation and interest rates have a strong impact on both the health of the farm sector and on the effectiveness of agricultural legislation.

The 1970's, with their double-digit inflation and rapidly expanding export market, provided an ideal stage for an expansion of agricultural production. Inflated land values provided growing paper equity that could be used to finance growth. Progressive farmers followed the suggestions of the marketplace and invested in what appeared to be a bright future in agriculture. But in stark contrast to the atmosphere of the 1970's, which covered up both management and policy oversights, the 1980's are characterized by a strong overall U.S. economy, low inflation and vibrant economic growth, accompanied by a strong U.S. dollar. These factors, combined with a maturing world agricultural economy, have worked to reduce our ability to export agricultural commodities and reverse past economic trends.

As we draft the 1985 farm bill, we must bear in mind the fact that, unlike the economy which characterized the 1970's, the low inflation and steady growth we are now experiencing are sustainable in the long run and must be considered as we develop a plan for American agriculture.

Overzealous economic incentives, brought about by Federal farm legislation, will in the long run only jeopardize any opportunity our children may now have to make their homes and livelihoods on American farms.

Many recent studies have explored the damaging effect our farm programs have had on the agricultural economy. These studies clearly warn that, if we do not quickly correct ineffective agriculural policies, the European Economic Community, Brazil, Argentina, Australia, China and other developing agricultural economies will replace the United States as the world's primary supplier of food and fiber.

How can we promote the return of stability and vitality to our farm sector over the long run without fully relying upon Federal price support programs? I would suggest that we adhere to several general policy guidelines similar to those which Secretary John Block has developed over the last 5 years.

We must begin this reconstruction by going back to our roots, toward a truly market-based farm economy. The best way to return health to this most precious of natural resources, the American farm family, is through a gradual and well planned move toward market dependence. For let me make clear, that I believe the objective of our approach should be the strengthening of our agricultural economy, and specifically, the family farm.

The first plank in our program must encourage our farmers to utilize the enormous technological productivity advantage they now enjoy. Limits on production, over and above prudent conservation practices, should only be employed as a short-run, voluntary, supply management tool. It is abundantly clear, that as we unilaterally withdraw valuable cropland from production, our competitors have and will eagerly fill the supply gap. Additional agricultural resources brought into production by our competitors will not quickly be removed, but will ensure continued competition in the world marketplace. Under no circumstances should mandatory, broad-scale production controls be included as a permanent provision of our farm programs, as they quite obviously are contrary to everything our economy was built upon. I believe I can confidently speak for the farmers of Indiana and elsewhere when I say that additional Federal management on the farm is the last thing they want or need.

I have mentioned the need for conservation practices as one part of a program to revitalize the farm economy. I fully endorse efforts underway in both the Senate and House agriculture committees to include both a strong "sodbuster" provision and a long-term reserve in the 1985 farm bill. As an original cosponsor of Senator ARMSTRONG's sodbuster bill, as well as a supporter of similar efforts which have regrettably failed in Congress in the past, I am encouraged by Secretary Block's display of support for these measures.

The sodbuster provision that recently passed both agricultural committees would prohibit the payment of Federal assistance to an operator who has planted a crop on highly erodible soil within the past 5 years. As many experts have noted, soil erosion has increased drastically over the last few years. Erosion from wind and rain, if left unchecked, represents one of the most imminent threats confronting agriculture. Consistent with this constructive initiative, I also believe we must revisit our tax codes, through which investment and improvement incentives have encouraged the plowing of erodible soil and the draining of our wetlands.

In addition, a long-run conservation reserve, which would encourage farmers to idle up to 30 million acres of erodible soil, would have several advantages. It would protect fragile and valuable soil, and provide additional cover for wildlife habitat. The plan would provide farmers with an additional source of income stability, as the Department of Agriculture would contract with farmers based on competitive bids. Further, the conservation reserve would help reduce swelling grain surpluses, which reduce commodity prices and increase Federal farm-support program costs. The USDA estimates that as much as 53 million acres might be eligible for such contracts and that yearly payments to farmers could amount to between $40 and $50 per acre. Finally, the removal of erodible soil from production will help consolidate resources by limiting the use of costly inputs and labor to our most productive farmland, which will lower per unit cost of production and increase overall productivity and profitability.

The long-term viability of American agriculture depends on our ability to sell farm products abroad. As sponsor of S. 171, the Agricultural Trade Enhancement Act of 1985, I have spoken out repeatedly on the crucial role that exports play. I am pleased to see so much attention being given to the export title of the 1985 farm bill, and I am especially encouraged to see that the intermediate-term export credit program which I introduced on the first day the U.S. Senate met this year may be incorporated as a part of the 1985 act. But I must stress that the true measure of a successful export program will lie in the resulting commercial sales of farm products, not those which require Federal credit assistance or export bonuses.

The importance of agricultural trade cannot be overstated. From an economic, humanitarian and national security perspective, our ability to remain competitive in the world commodity markets is crucial to the health of both our farm economy and our Nation in general.

The United States is the world's leading supplier of agricultural produce. But, since 1981, agricultural exports have fallen from a high of over $43 billion to only $38 billion in 1984. The USDA has continued to reduce its projection of 1985 sales, now estimated to be below $34 billion. Several economic and trade related factors have contributed to this decline, including the 1980 grain embargo, increasingly aggressive competition and the high value of the dollar. In addition, the rigid increases of loan rates built into the 1981 bill systematically priced American wheat and feed grains out of world markets. We must work to make sure that the 1985 farm bill will not similarly restrict U.S. agricultural exports.

We simply must take into account the impact of changing market conditions as we craft new farm legislation in 1985. This may require that we divorce income protection mechanisms from commodity prices. The risks of continuing to set goals for world production through our farm legislation are too great to do otherwise. This brings me to my third point—the need to establish realistic yet effective price support levels for our major commodities, such as wheat and feed grains.

We must realize that the inflexibility of the 1981 legislation, along with its frequent alterations, brought about both an overpricing of our farm products, and burdensome requirements on the Treasury. This point is made painfully clear when one considers that from 1980 through 1984, the United States spent unprecedented levels on farm programs, over $50 billion, while at the same time we witnessed the most severe farm recession since the 1930's. This experience should be enough to convince us that we cannot ignore market mechanisms and continue an attempt to buy prosperity through Federal price and income supports. In sum, the 1985 farm bill should be market-sensitive and responsive to contemporary economic realities.

To accomplish this, we must set loan rates, the primary pricing mechanism of our support system, at levels that will encourage the sale of our products in world markets. Initially, this may require some downward adjustment in loan rates. But I would insist that we tie loan rates to market prices, perhaps as a fixed percentage of the 3-year average market price for each commodity, as many have suggested. In order to protect the income of our producers during this transition period, we can maintain target prices at levels that will enable them to maintain income while reestablishing the financial soundness and competitiveness of American agriculture. This process may take several years, but we must have as our goal the gradual elimination of income support programs.

Fourth, our new farm programs should target assistance where it is most needed and desired: toward the full-time family farmer. Unfortunately, most of the benefits from past programs have ended up in the hands of our largest producers, and while many of these operations may well be productive and efficient farms, they by no means require such a disproportionate share of Federal assistance.

There exist several proposed plans for the targeting of assistance to the family farm, including overall payment limitations, tiered loan and target price levels, and restricted eligibility requirements. All of these plans recognize the importance of accurately placing Federal support in the hands of the full-time producer, who depends upon farm income for his or her living.

Each recognizes too, that 88 percent of this Nation's 2.3 million farms sell less than $100,000 worth of farm products, while those who sell more than $100,000 have in the past enjoyed the benefits of a large share of Federal benefits. For example, in 1983, 95 percent of all Federal Farm Program participants received benefits totaling less than $25,000, but the remaining 5 percent of payees received funds accounting for over 39 percent of total assistance provided. The largest 12 percent of the participants accounted for some 45 percent of total assistance provided in 1983.

It is obvious that the structure of our programs have disproportionately channeled Federal assistance to the largest of our farms. The 1985 farm bill should efficiently target assistance to the full-time family farmer, who with his family as his primary source of labor, represents the group most in need of income support and stability. Smaller farm operators depend upon off-farm income as their principal means of income, and therefore generally do not require Federal assistance. Nor should we encourage, through our farm programs, the production of farm commodities as a hobby. On the other hand, very large operations enjoy the advantages of economies of scale. They are often owned by more than one proprietor, have available to them broader financial means, and usually require outside labor. These entities should be considered as would any other large business, and should not receive a disproportionate share of Federal assistance.

The construction of a new farm bill will allow Congress the opportunity to improve upon inconsistencies and conflicting priorities which have been much a part of past legislation. For example, our most recent dairy program paid farmers to produce milk, while simultaneously taxing them through assessments in order to pay them to reduce production. Our volume-based commodity price support programs encouraged overproduction and sodbusting, while the Commodity Credit Corporation spent millions in taxpayers dollars to store excess commodities. As I mentioned before, our Tax Code has served as a vehicle for crossed priorities as well. In short, the 1985 farm bill should be interprogram and cross-program consistent.

We can remedy these obvious inconsistencies by removing those provisions of our law which encourage practices that contrast with the intentions of our farm legislation. For example, I strongly support an agressive sodbuster provision, which would stop what has been a federally financed incentive to utilize highly erodible soils. Second, I support efforts to move our dairy price support program to a market-oriented program, where the level of price support would be based on the level of Commodity Credit Corporation dairy purchases. This approach would return realistic incentives to the marketplace, and assist in the reduction of costly surplus stocks. There are cetainly other areas where inconsistencies lie, including the complicated regulations which surround our set-aside requirements, which have in the past provided incentives for the production of livestock and alternative crops. Our restrictive production allotments should also be questioned, as they restrict entry into, and exit from the production of certain crops. I would hope that as we construct the 1985 farm bill, we will seriously examine the costs and benefits of these and other provisions.

One of the most important and timely issues that this Congress will address is that of farm credit. It is not surprising, given the factors I discussed earlier, that many of our farmers are finding it ever more difficult to secure dependable credit. Some have called this situation a "credit crisis," implying that a shortage of capital exists in the farm financial community. In fact the credit situation stems from a declining number of farmers capable of qualifying for the same loans they were able to receive only a few years ago. This is happening because land and asset values are falling, thereby diminishing farmers' collateral. Thus, what some are calling a credit crisis actually results from a lack of profitability. As land values soared during the 1970's, farmers were able to borrow against their land and often did so to finance expansion. Now, as collateral decreases, highly leveraged farmers are finding it impossible to borrow equivalent sums against the very same property.

One of the most disturbing consequences of these economic changes is the dramatic impact they have had on the Farm Credit System. The Farm Credit System, which includes the Federal land banks, the production credit associations and the bank for cooperatives, today finds itself in a very troublesome position. With a loan portfolio limited to farm credit, and faced with increasing losses, these banks have been forced to make drastic structural changes and may well require some form of Federal assistance in the near future. Congress must strongly consider the farm credit situation as it looks ahead toward efforts to revitalize the farm economy.

One cannot credibly examine nor effectively develop agricultural legislation without considering the dramatic impact our fiscal, trade, monetary, and budgetary policies have on the farm economy. In fact, these considerations, and how Congress and the President address them, may well have a more profound impact on the health of our farm economy than anything included in the 1985 farm legislation. Unless Congress can come to grips with the Federal budget deficit, barriers to international trade, inconsistent tax codes, and volatile interest rates, our painstaking efforts to construct a workable farm policy may well be in vain.

This farm bill must be developed within responsible budgetary restraints. Every budget-busting dollar we spend will be one added to the Federal budget deficit, and the effects of the deficit on such critical factors as real interest rates and the strength of the U.S. dollar are especially damaging to the farm economy.

In closing, I believe that in drafting the 1985 farm bill this Congress has both an opportunity and a tremendous responsibility to develop an effective agricultural policy that will work toward a strong and sound farm economy. Simply put, the livelihood of millions of Americans, both on and off the farm, is at stake. I hope that as Congress approaches this critical task, it does so with a solid understanding of the contemporary issues at hand, and with lessons of the past clearly in mind.

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, chalk up another one for the U.S. Congress. No farm bill.

This is nonsense, Mr. President, absolute nonsense. This adds to a long string of injustices to the American farmer.

Just how much more depressed does the agricultural situation have to get before our Nation—including this Congress—wakes up. How much tears need to flow in roads and fields in rural America before this Congress recognizes the anguish of agriculture. We seem to care more about the future of the whooping crane than the family farmer and rancher. We need a broad-based national commitment to agriculture and rural America. Our neighbors residing on farms and in rural towns are exhausted, they've given all they have to give. They need and deserve our full attention and support and that support is an investment, not a subsidy. Future generations of Americans, and other nations, will stand in judgment of the inability of our generation to make decisions relative to food production.

It's been almost 5 months ago, Mr. President, that I was privileged to appear as the leadoff witness before the Senate Agriculture Committee as it began its deliberations on the 1985 farm bill. I presented to the committee, at that time, 3,000 pages of testimony received at Joint Economic Committee hearings, from over 200 expert witnesses during the previous 2 years, all addressing the economic condition of agriculture and future farm policy. As I am not a member of the Agriculture Committee, this was my contribution to getting that committee started quickly and in the right direction. Apparently, and sadly, partisan politics took precedence over public policy.

Over the last several weeks, I've pleaded with Members on both sides of the aisle in the Agriculture Committee to pick a bill, any bill—get something to the floor and let's give farmers the priority attention they deserve and so desperately need.

And now I—all of us—must return to our States emptyhanded and not one of us will or should escape the wrath of our farmer-constituents. There will be no acceptable excuses; we had the time, we had the resources, but we lacked the awareness and the heart. When I return to South Dakota I will share with my fellow farmers and ranchers my best judgments regarding the 1985 farm bill and then we shall return to Washington and nothing will stop us from doing what must be done.

Mr. President, I cosponsored the resolution calling for the Congress not to go out of session until the farm bill had been passed. I also signed a motion for cloture. If I could, I'd physically keep this Congress in session.

I have a suggestion, Mr. President. When the Congress reconvenes in September, I suggest it reconvene in Kenebec, SD; I would suggest the Odd Fellows Hall, but it's closed. You would be surprised how persuasive those folks can be.

TAX REFORM AND THE AGRICULTURAL ECONOMY

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, the Federal income tax system has a significant impact on the agricultural economy. In some cases, this impact comes from provisions that affect businesses generally, such as the accelerated cost recovery system and the favorable treatment of capital gains. In other cases, it comes from provisions that affect farms and ranches specifically, such as special cash accounting rules and soil conservation deductions.

Most of these provisions were designed to help businesses in general, and farmers and ranchers in particular, by encouraging investment and increasing productivity. However, some farmers and ranchers and some agricultural economists think that these provisions' cumulative impact is largely negative. They believe that many of the provisions have grown so complicated that farmers and ranchers are burdened with excessive paperwork. And they believe that tax incentives have sometimes attracted tax shelter investments that encourage overproduction, increase land prices, and otherwise distort the agricultural economy.

TAX REFORM

In the same way that the current tax system has a significant impact on the farm economy, tax reform will have a significant impact on the farm economy, for good or ill.

At a time when the agricultural economy is reeling from heavy debt, low prices, and a record number of farm foreclosures, it's critical that we fully understand and openly debate the potential ramifications of tax reform for the agricultural economy.

Earlier this year, I asked the Congressional Research Service to study the effect of the Treasury Department's first tax reform plan on farm income. CRS completed the study in February. On May 28, the administration announced Treasury II, its revised tax reform plan.

In response, CRS has updated its first report to analyze the impact of Treasury II on farm income taxation.

CONCLUSION

I hope that this new report stimulates further study and debate. We must analyze not only the primary impact of reform on the tax burden on agricultural income, but also the secondary impact on the structure of the agricultural economy; not only the short-term impact, but also the long-term impact. Thus informed, we can openly debate the proper relationship between the Federal tax system and the agricultural economy.

I ask that the full text of CRS' updated report be printed in the RECORD.

The report follows:

IMPACT OF THE PRESIDENT'S TAX PROPOSALS ON FARM INCOME TAXATION

INTRODUCTION

On May 28, 1985, the Administration released its long-awaited entry into the area of tax reform, calling it "The President's Tax Proposals to the Congress for Fairness, Growth, and Simplicity." It is based on the document published by Treasury in November 1984 (now being called "Treasury I"), [1] but with a number of changes. Since Treasury I was extensively analyzed, most discussions of the President's Proposals start from these analyses.

This report is an updating of two previous CRS reports on the effects of Treasury I and other tax reform proposals on the taxes paid on farm income.[2] It follows the pattern of those reports in concentrating on the provisions of current tax law of special importance to farmers and how these provisions fare in the proposed tax revisions.

I. The President's proposals and Treasury I

Like the original Treasury proposal, the President's tax proposal trades reduced tax rates for a broader tax base. The broader base is achieved by taxing some currently tax-exempt income but mostly by reducing currently allowed deductions.

Tax rates for individuals are essentially the same in the President's proposals as they were in Treasury I, but the starting point (the zero-bracket amount) is slightly higher ($4,000 instead of $3,800 for couples, for example). The maximum corporate tax rate remains 33 percent, but there are graduated rates on the first $100,000 of taxable income (phased out as income rises so that any corporation with taxable income of $360,000 or more would pay at a flat 33 percent rate). Ten percent of dividends paid are deductible by the corporation, rather than the 50 percent provided in Treasury I.

The President's proposal does not attempt to bring in as many untaxed sources of income as the Treasury I proposal did. In particular, employee fringe benefits are not made taxable (except for a small "floor" under health insurance premiums). Of the changes in personal deductions from Treasury I, the floor under charitable contributions is removed but State and local taxes are still nondeductible. Most of the tax benefits of specific industries are repealed, as in Treasury I, with the well-publicized exception of the oil and gas industry.

Most of the reductions in tax benefits for agriculture from Treasury I are retained in the President's proposals, and in the case of cash accounting, the restrictions are tightened slightly. More liberal deductions for depreciation are provided and the indexing of interest payments is dropped, however, so on balance the taxes on farm income may be less under the President's proposal than under Treasury I.

II. Cash accounting

Farmers have never been required to keep their books on an accrual basis, even for the production of inventories or assets that will be held to produce income far into the future (with some specific exceptions, such as large, non-family corporations). Accounting for such costs on a cash basis allows the deduction of expenses before the income they produce has to be reported, sometimes long before. In addition, accelerating or postponing the purchase of materials and supplies can be used as an averaging device that can be of considerable importance in smoothing out the profitability cycles inherent in the farm economy.

Like the Treasury I proposal, the President's proposal requires the capitalization of all expenses incurred in raising livestock, trees, and other assets with preproduction periods of two years or more. Instead of being deductible currently, these expenses would be depreciated over the life of the asset they went to create after that asset producing income. Like the cost of other depreciable assets, these capitalized costs would be indexed for inflation. The President's proposal explicitly defines the preproduction period for livestock to include the gestation period.

Under Treasury I, farmers would not have been required to use inventory accounting if they were not required to do so under present law. Under the President's proposal, however, any farm with average gross receipts over the past three years of $5,000,000 or more would be required to use accrual accounting for all income and expenses, including inventory costs.

As under Treasury I, the special expensing privileges for soil and water conservation expenses, fertilizer and soil conditioner expenses, and land clearing expenses are repealed.

III. Capital gains

Under present law, gains on sales of assets classified as capital assets are tax-favored: for individuals, 60 percent are excluded from taxable income and for corporations, there is a maximum tax rate of 28 percent on them. Gains on long-lived assets used in trade or business receive this favorable treatment. Under some circumstances, sales of livestock, timber, and unharvested crops sold with the land also receive capital gains treatment.

The Treasury I proposal did away with the capital gains treatment altogether and taxed all gains on all sales at the same tax rates. Assets sold were indexed for inflation, however, so only real gains were taxed. The President's proposal contains tax preferences for capital gains (a 50 percent exclusion for individuals); but it does not include depreciable assets, livestock, timber, or unharvested crops sold with the land in the definition, so the effect is the same as Treasury I. The basis of any asset excluded from capital gains treatment would be indexed for inflation before computing gain or loss on its sale.

Farm land would, at least initially, receive capital gains treatment under the President's proposals. Individuals could exclude 50 percent of any gain and corporations would pay a maximum tax rate of 28 percent on it. But the discussion of the proposals expresses doubts about the propriety of this treatment for land used in a trade or business and suggests that "consideration would be given" to making it ineligible for capital gains treatment (p. 173).

IV. Depreciation

Present tax law contains depreciation and other capital recovery provisions that provide a heavy subsidy to the use of depreciable assets. In the case of some equipment and, particularly, single-purpose agricultural structures (such as hog barns), the subsidy is very large indeed. Singlepurpose structures, for example, receive a 10-percent investment tax credit and can be depreciated over 5 years.

Under Treasury I, the investment tax credits were repealed and depreciation was based on empirical studies of actual declines in economic value. Depreciation deductions were adjusted for inflation and so approximated real economic depreciation.

The President's proposal moves back toward explicit subsidies for investments in depreciable property. The investment tax credits are repealed, but a subsidy is delivered through a system of accelerated, real (inflation-adjusted) deductions. Assets are grouped into classes that correspond to observed patterns of economic depreciation, as in Treasury I, but the lives and depreciation rates are designed to give larger deductions than economic depreciation in the asset's early years. Most farm machinery and equipment (incuding, initially, single-purpose structures) is depreciated over a 7-year life with an initial depreciation rate corresponding to 154-percent declining balance depreciation. Farm buildings, except single-purpose structures, are depreciated over 28 years with an initial 112-percent declining balance rate. In both cases, the initial declining balance rates switch to straight-line rates at the most advantageous time. The depreciable basis is indexed each year for inflation, as in Treasury I.

The subsidy provided by this accelerated depreciation is greater than any in Treasury I, but it is much smaller than the subsidies provided by the investment tax credit and ACRS under present law. It must be borne in mind, however, that with indexation, reduced tax rates, and other tax changes in this proposal, the net effect may well be a reduced overall tax rate compared to present law. Such is the conclusion concerning the agricultural sector in a recent CRS study of corporation tax rates.[3]

Under both Treasury I and the President's proposal, the election allowed under present law to expense up to $5,000 of depreciable property purchases annually is retained.

V. Debt finance and indexation

The Treasury I proposal to index all interest income and most interest deductions except home mortgage interest is not included in the President's proposal. As net debtors, farmers stand to profit from this change, at least on their tax returns. Protecting lenders from inflation would have led to lower interest rates, however, so it is hard to say whether this change is positive or negative on balance.

The President's proposal retains from Treasury I the provision limiting the deductibility of nonbusiness interest to $5,000 plus net investment income, and also includes in the definition of nonbusiness interest a limited partner's share of the interest paid by a limited partnership. Since the proposal to tax limited partnerships with more than 35 partners was dropped, this interest limitation is the most important remaining curb on tax shelter partnerships.

The President's proposed tax system is much more thoroughly indexed than the present system, but it is not as thoroughly indexed as the Treasury I system. Physical assets are rather thoroughly protected from inflation, but debt instruments are not. In Treasury I, the indexation of interest income and deductions substituted for indexation of debt, but even that rough approximation is not included in the President's proposal. Indexing assets but not liabilities can serve to encourage debt financing and should probably be looked upon as a windfall by debtors.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. QUAYLE). The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, just briefly, let me remark on the farm bill and what we are doing there, or perhaps not doing. I speak now not as a Member of the leadership, but as a Senator representing a State which has a large agricultural interest, indeed, we have cattle, sheep, wool, feed grains, sugar beets, honey, and many other products and we find a situation where we see agriculture in America in absolute chaos. More ironically and tragically, we see a situation where we injected $3 billion into agriculture in 1979—that was our entire agricultural outlay of expenditure then—and now during the first 4 years of this administration, we have channeled $63 billion into agriculture, which is a figure of $16 billion per year. Totally extraordinary. And in that period of time, we have seen more farms go out of existence than any time in our history, in any 4-year period.

Obviously, agriculture is very sick and it will not be healed by partisan rambling with regard to the programs that we are considering.

I would speak about the cattle industry in Wyoming, which is about the only remaining part of agriculture that does not get a nickel from the Federal Government. But they are on the ropes, too. So whether you are laying the bucks on or keeping the bucks out, you have agriculture in turmoil.

As one not on the Agriculture Committee, I have watched, observed, and listened, and I know the turmoil that is going on in that place. I also know the intent of some of the participants. I would hope that others may begin to perceive the intent of some of the participants so that at least we begin to know where the bones are buried.

It is interesting to see how the measure is being used as kind of a self-detonating device. It seems they want to see how many Republican Senators from farm States can be blown out of the water. But I think we have a higher task than that. I do not speak to save my position as assistant majority leader. I will have plenty to do here in whatever capacity I choose to undertake.

But surely no responsible person can go through what we have gone through with the anguish of the budget, casting the hard votes, attacking 13 programs of the Federal Government, not only cutting back on some but completely eliminating some, dealing with the hard issues, and the gut-hard issue, if you will, of the cost-of-living allowance on Social Security, and the defense budget. You can't do all that and not have strong feelings about the course of the farm bill.

I have always said, and I mean it quite honestly, that the people of America are smarter than their elected representatives. I think that is the basic reason the country has existed for 200-plus years. It really does not take any effort to figure out that the way we will save money and cut the deficit is to deal candidly with the defense budget, Social Security, Medicare, Medicaid, veterans' benefits, and civilian and military retirement.

You really do not have to have any corner on intelligence or common sense to know that that is "where it is." But if we do not do that, then we are all at fault. I do not close myself out.

We have come to a point in this country where the interest groups begin to gin up their stuff, and they are very adept at that. The troubling thing is that if you were not alert and bright, like the people of America are when they have the full information before them, one would almost begin to believe that when we try to do something with Social Security, we are doing in all of the poor and the senior citizens, even a very limited thing, which would save us $20 billion to $28 billion in 3 years by limiting the cost-of-living allowance—and doing that across the board and the veterans are very agreeable to that and other groups within the society are very agreeable to that, as long as it affects everybody the same way. So we try to do that, and that is alarming to groups who are here in Washington and whose leadership has assigned the task to those people here somewhere down on K Street or in one of the warrens downtown. Their sole function is to juice up the troops. They do that magnificently, I might add.

I think we see that same thing occurring with regard to the farm problem. I think our vision of the farmer we are trying to help is someone with the earthy ring of someone from the early 1930's standing there with the Oshkosh B'Gosh overalls on, looking off into the sunset with a hoe in his hand. That solid American is not getting very much out of America's farm programs. He is not receiving the money.

Fifty percent of the farmers in the United States will never see one nickel of this farm bill money whether it is $2 billion or $82 billion. Fifty percent of the people in the United States who are in farming will never see that. It is important to hear that. We only have 2.5 million persons in farming anyway. So half of those will never see a nickel of whatever we produce here.

It is an extraordinary thing for we could be here doing it for the little guy, for the little farmer, and we pretend that is what we are doing. Yet all we have done is to inject an extraordinary amount of funds into the farm economy and nothing has happened. And nothing will happen as long as we simply extend these programs and that is what we will perhaps do in this body. Too bad.

I think it is important for the people at least to understand that in 1984 nearly 90 percent of all Federal farm payments went to wheat, feedgrains, cotton, rice, and dairy. Yet those commodities accounted for only 31 percent of the total cash receipts from all farming in 1984.

Even those payments do not appear to be distributed in a fair manner. Twenty-five percent of all dairymen got 62 percent of all total payments for 1984. For wheat in 1984, only 1.5 percent of the producers got 14.5 percent of all the payments. Two percent of the corn producers hauled down 16 percent of the total payments. Twelve percent of the cotton producers received 56 percent of all the cotton payments. And for heavy hitters try this: Twenty-two percent of the rice producers received 65 percent of the total payments.

I have not really included anybody from my area yet.

There is a serious issue in my State, with a very important agricultural component, the wool growers.

Under the present Wool Act, it is no longer appropriate to say that it does not cost the Government anything simply because it is raised from tariffs. It is appropriate to say that what you do not get into the general treasury in tariffs is less income to the United States. So it is a tough issue. And yet the Wool Act is the only program left in the agriculture economy that is still tied in some way to a type of parity.

We see wool production going down and the Wool Act payments going up. It is the only agricultural area where, with production going down, the cost of subsidizing it is going up. Those graph lines now cross on that.

I do not know what to do with that. We are going to be debating it. I think it calls for some type of correction.

Then, of course, one that I shall share with my colleagues and then cease ramblings—as one who is not on the Committee on Agriculture but rather interested in what has happened. A classic example would be to look at the honey programs of the United States, where we have 107 million going out to honey producers—maybe 2,500 of them, I do not know exactly how many there are. We subsidize the market for that product, but there is no world market for that product. It is odd, I think—a bit odd, it seems to me—that we would support a market for a product that has no world price. So we see that it is 65 cents a pound and one-half of the product is then purchased by the Federal Government. Yet, we still import that same one-half from other governments. Do not ask me how that works, Mr. President. It boggles the mind. It really is not worth commenting on any further. But that is what the honey program is: half of it is purchased by the Government and held in drums, which often then spoil. Then we import honey in the same amount as the half that is supported by the Federal Government, and in addition—and this is an extraordinary bit of adventurism—you can buy honey from another country for 30 cents and bring it in here and sell it to the Government for 65 cents, and sell the imported stuff in the local grocery and sell the home grown stuff to the Government to be stored by the barrel.

That, I think, is a dazzling program. And it fits with what I have said before, that our vision here, in the Senate and in the House, is that we are trying to take care of good solid people who are "working the land". I submit that we are not. We are taking care of the people who are "working the programs." And that is the difference. And there are a lot of them.

As Annie Landers says, as soon as we wake up and smell the coffee on that one, we will begin to make progress, because there are a lot of people interested in these farm programs who must be chuckling and saying "Lord, I think they are going to do it again." So stand behind the door while we pull the latch on Fort Knox and see if we can gimmick the system one more time—work the program instead of working the land. Put the battalions of accountants and lawyers into the trench and say, "How can we milk that program better than we can milk even the agriculture dairy program," which needs our attention. I hope we will give that to it too.

Those are the things that I think ought to be said out on the floor as we deal with the great hysteria and some real hype about the poor old guy in agricultural America. Sure they are there. Well help them then. Because when we are all done with this stuff at whatever level we come in, only half of them are ever going to get a penny of it. The rest of it is going to go to some pretty sharp cookies in America—guys who have learned beautifully how to work the programs instead of working the land.

Our programs are a "laughter" in any league when you think what we have done with agriculture in the United States. They still smack of what was the situation in this country in the 1930's, and that is not where we are now.

It is a jumble of contradictions. We pay farmers to produce and produce and produce and then turn around, the same Government, and tell them not to produce and pay them for that. We set up farmers' reserves and set-asides and targeted this and targeted that, all of it is absolute disarray—figures, numbers, nobody could give you the right figures; bring your own to the table and you can do better than if you take anybody else's.

Certainly continuing this in agriculture is not the answer. We must move toward some market-oriented programs, some loan program targeted to market. That must come. We cannot do it immediately but must structurally phase it in. If we do not get that done this trip, then we can continue the fun and games as to who can punch a hole in Senator So-and-So in November 1986 and chuckle about it.

Or we can be thoughtful in a very bipartisan way and say, what do we do about a program that is costing us $63 billion in 4 years and now are we going to do it again and just extend it? Or, if we do not extend it, just take care of the heavy hitters and forget the little guy? That enables us, of course, to generate the enthusiasm of the debate. The poor old little guy is how we get the debate going. But that is not who is getting the jack.

Maybe we can, I hope—not now, but as we get into the after-the-recess period—actually honestly confront the farm problems of this country and see where the money goes, who receives it, why they receive it, whether the reason for that is still here or whether those reasons are no longer here, whether things have changed.

I have a kind of hunch that things have changed a bit since the 1930's, so it might be well to reexamine the farm programs in the context of the market as of the 1980's instead of the 1930's and I harbor the fond hope that we might be able to do that.

So, Mr. President, I hope that I do not have to listen—yet I know I shall have to, because I have no choice—to too much more, however, about the poor old "little guy"—and he is there; he is indeed out there. But since he is there, why not help him instead of helping the entrenched and the powerful instead of the agricultural portion of America which is powerless and disenfranchised and not able to figure out how to work the program.

I shall be interested in the debate. I look forward to it. I shall be in there, perhaps in a way where I shall see things that will be detrimental to my own State's agricultural interests. But, for Heaven's sake, let us try a little honesty and less hype, a little bit of candor instead of emotion.

As you have all heard me state before, I deal with these issues of immigration reform, veterans, nuclear regulation. You learn how to pass or kill a bill in this place based upon a deft blend of fear, guilt, emotion, or racism. It is really sometimes a ringy place to work.

Maybe when we deal with the farm bill as we should with other issues, we can finally at least define that essence of politics and at least recognize it as the arena where appetite and ambition compete openly with knowledge and wisdom. Let us hope we use a little more of the latter instead of the former as we try to grapple with the farm bill in an honest way.

That is a naive hope, I admit, but perhaps that can be done.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UNIFORM RELOCATION ASSISTANCE AND REAL PROPERTY ACQUISITION POLICIES ACT OF 1970

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now turn to Calendar No. 261, S. 249, uniform relocation assistance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRD. No objection, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The bill will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 249) to amend the Uniform Relocation Assistance and Real Property Acquisition Policies Act of 1970.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I would like to make a few brief comments on the budget impact of S. 249, the Uniform Relocation Act Amendments of 1985.

This bill amends the Uniform Relocation Assistance and Real Property Acquisition Policies Act of 1970. That act provides for the compensation of individuals and businesses whose property must be destroyed or relocated as a result of the activities of State or Federal Government. Payments made under this program to displaced persons or businesses are considered to be entitlements under the Congressional Budget Act.

This bill would provide increased entitlement authority in years for which we do not yet have budget resolutions, and therefore, violates the Congressional Budget Act.

However, as chairman of the Budget Committee, I feel that this technical problem should not be raised in connection with this bill. Although S. 249 would increase Federal expenditures in fiscal year 1986 by $100,000 because of increased administrative expenses, those costs as well as the cost of the increased entitlement authority would be offset by savings in the bill which result in a net decrease in spending of $2 million in fiscal year 1987 and $8 million in fiscal year 1988. This information is derived from a 2-year-old Congressional Budget Office cost estimate, but I am assured that the figures remain more or less accurate.

It is my understanding that the increased administrative expenses will be absorbed within the existing funds of the affected agencies for fiscal year 1986.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate and open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed, as follows:

S. 249

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Uniform Relocation Act Amendments of 1985".

(1) by striking out the matter preceding paragraph (1) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(c) Any displaced person eligible for payments under subsection (a) of this section who is displaced from the person's place of business or farm operation and who is eligible under criteria established by the head of the lead agency may elect to accept the payment authorized by this subsection in lieu of the payment authorized by subsection (a) of this section. Such payment shall consist of a fixed payment in an amount to be determined according to criteria established by the head of the lead agency, except that such payment shall not be less than $1,000 nor more than $20,000. A person whose sole business is renting displacement property to others shall not qualify for this payment.".

(d) Section 202 of the Uniform Act (42 U.S.C. 4622) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(d)(1) For the purposes of this section and section 101(6)—

"(B) The term 'utility' means any electric, gas, water, steam power or materials transmission or distribution system, any transportation system, or any communications system (including cable television), and any fixtures, equipment, or other property appropriate to the operation, maintenance, or repair of the foregoing. A utility may be publicly, privately, or cooperatively owned.

"(2) Except when provided otherwise by Federal law, whenever a federally assisted program or project undertaken by a displacing agency other than a Federal agency will result in the displacement of a utility from property under the ownership or control of a State or local agency, the head of the displacing agency shall provide a payment to the utility company pursuant to State or local law or a written contract, if any, between the utility company and the State or local agency, but in no event shall such payment exceed the actual reasonable cost of relocation of such utility.

"(3) Nothing in this subsection shall supercede a State or local law or a written contract between a utility company and a State or local government, or require a payment to be made where none is required under State or local law or a written contract.

"(4) Nothing in this subsection shall deprive a utility company of its rights under State or local law.

"(5) Nothing in this subsection shall require a Federal agency to increase its payment if the increased payment is attributable to a contract or contract amendment that is made in anticipation of the Federal payment.

"(6) Nothing in this subsection shall require a Federal payment in excess of the payment that a State or local agency would pay if no Federal funds were involved.

"(7) Nothing in this subsection confers jurisdiction on a court of the United States (as defined in section 451 of title 28, United States Code) to review any action of a displacing agency in carrying out this subsection or to review the right of a utility company to be compensated under State or local law.

"(e) Whenever a program or project directly undertaken by a Federal agency will result in the displacement of a utility as the result of Federal acquisition of real property under the ownership or control of a State or local agency, the head of the Federal agency shall either relocate the utility with the utility company's consent, or provide a payment to the utility equal to the actual reasonable cost of relocation of such utility. Such relocation or such payment shall not be required when it is provided otherwise by a Federal law, or a Federal regulation promulgated prior to March 17, 1983, or a contract or agreement with a Federal agency.".

REPLACEMENT HOUSING FOR HOMEOWNER

(2) by striking "$15,000" and inserting in lieu thereof, "$22,500";

(3) by striking out "acquired by" and all that follows through "market" in paragraph (1)(A) and inserting in lieu thereof "acquired by the displacing agency, equals the reasonable cost of a suitable replacement dwelling";

(4) by striking out paragraph (1)(B) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(B) The amount, if any, which will compensate such person for any increased interest costs and other debt service costs which such person is required to pay for financing the acquisition of any such suitable replacement dwelling. Such amount shall be paid only if the dwelling acquired by the displacing agency was encumbered by a bona fide mortgage which was a valid lien on such dwelling for not less than one hundred and eighty days immediately prior to the initiation of negotiations for the acquisition of such dwelling."; and

(5) by striking out paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(2) The additional payment authorized by this section shall be made only to a displaced person who purchases and occupies a decent, safe, and sanitary replacement dwelling within one year after the date on which such person receives final payment from the displacing agency for the acquired dwelling or the date on which the displacing agency's obligation under section 205(c)(3) of this Act is met, whichever is later, except that the displacing agency may extend such period for good cause. If such period is extended, the payment under this section shall be based on the costs of relocating the person to a suitable replacement dwelling within one year of such date.".

REPLACEMENT HOUSING FOR TENANTS AND CERTAIN OTHERS

SEC. 204. Section 204 of the Uniform Relocation Assistance and Real Property Acquisition Policies Act of 1970 (42 U.S.C. 4624) is amended to read as follows:

"REPLACEMENT HOUSING FOR TENANTS AND CERTAIN OTHERS

"SEC. 204. (a) In addition to amounts otherwise authorized by this title, the head of a displacing agency shall make a payment to or for any displaced person displaced from any dwelling unit not eligible to receive a payment under section 203 which was actually and lawfully occupied by such displaced person for not less than ninety days immediately prior to the initiation of negotiations for acquisition of such dwelling, or, where displacement is not caused by acquisition, any other event which the head of the lead agency may prescribe. Such payment shall consist of the amount necessary to enable such person to lease or rent for a period not to exceed three years, a suitable replacement dwelling. For a person whose income exceeds 50 per centum of the median income of the area, as determined by the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, the amount referred to shall equal the lesser of (i) $4,500 or (ii) 36 times the amount obtained by subtracting the monthly housing costs for the displacement dwelling from the monthly housing costs for a suitable replacement dwelling. At the discretion of the head of the displacing agency, a payment under this subsection may be made in periodic installments.

"(b) Any displaced person eligible for payments under subsection (a) of this section may elect to receive in lieu thereof either Federal low income housing assistance or similar State or local governmental assistance if such assistance is available at the time of displacement and such person is otherwise eligible for such assistance. The failure of any such person to make such an election shall be considered when evaluating the eligibility of such person for any Federal or federally assisted low income housing assistance program during the three years following the date on which such person received the payment authorized under subsection (a) of this section.

"(c) Any person eligible for a payment under subsection (a) of this section may elect to apply such payment to a downpayment on, and other incidental expenses pursuant to, the purchase of a decent, safe, and sanitary replacement dwelling. A displaced homeowner who has occupied the displacement dwelling for at least ninety days but not more than one hundred and eighty days immediately prior to the initiation of negotiations for the acquisition of such dwelling may, at the discretion of the head of the displacing agency, be eligible for the maximum payment allowed under this subsection: Provided, That such payment shall not exceed the payment such person would otherwise have received under section 203(a) of this Act had the person occupied the displacement dwelling for one hundred and eighty days immediately prior to the initiation of such negotiations.".

RELOCATION ASSISTANCE COORDINATION AND ADVISORY SERVICES

SEC. 205. Section 205 of the Uniform Relocation Assistance and Real Property Acquisition Policies Act of 1970 (42 U.S.C. 4625) and its catchline are amended to read as follows:

"RELOCATION ASSISTANCE COORDINATION AND ADVISORY SERVICES

"SEC. 205. (a) The head of any displacing agency shall assure that the relocation assistance advisory services described in subsection (c) of this section are made available to all persons displaced by such agency. If such agency head determines that any person occupying property immediately adjacent to the property where the displacing activity occurs is caused substantial economic injury as a result thereof, the agency head may make available to such person such advisory services.

"(b) The Secretary of Housing and Urban Development shall assign a high priority for assistance under the programs referred to in sections 204(b) and 206(b) of this Act to persons eligible under such sections. To the extent practicable, the Secretary shall require that federally assisted State and local governmental low income housing assistance programs assign priority for assistance to such persons. To the extent practicable, the Administrator of the Small Business Administration and the heads of other Federal agencies administering programs which may be of assistance to displaced persons shall make available technical assistance under subsection (c)(5) of this section and expedite the applications for such assistance by such persons.

"(c) Each relocation assistance advisory program required by subsection (a) of this section shall include such measures, facilities, or services as may be necessary or appropriate in order to—

"(1) determine, and make timely recommendations on, the needs and preferences, if any, of displaced persons for relocation assistance;

"(2) provide current and continuing information about sales prices and rental charges on suitable replacement dwellings for displaced homeowners and tenants and suitable locations for businesses and farm operations;

"(3) assure that a person shall not be required to move from a dwelling unless the person has had a reasonable opportunity to relocate to a suitable replacement dwelling;

"(4) assist a person displaced from a business or farm operation in obtaining and becoming established in a suitable replacement location;

"(5) supply information concerning other Federal programs which may be of assistance to displaced persons, and technical assistance to such persons in applying for assistance under such programs;

"(6) provide other advisory services to displaced persons in order to minimize hardships to such persons in adjusting to relocation; and

"(7) assure that a one hundred and eighty day homeowner-occupant is given a reasonable opportunity to remain in such occupancy status.

"(d) The head of a displacing agency shall coordinate the relocation activities performed by such agency with other Federal, State, or local governmental actions in the community which could affect the efficient and effective delivery of relocation assistance and related services.

"(e) Whenever two or more Federal agencies provide financial assistance to a displacing agency other than a Federal agency, to implement functionally or geographically related activities which will result in the displacement of a person, the heads of such Federal agencies may by agreement designate one such agency as the cognizant Federal agency whose procedures shall be utilized to implement the activities. If such agreement cannot be reached, then the head of the lead agency shall designate one such agency as the cognizant agency. Such related activities constitute a single program or project for purposes of this Act.".

HOUSING REPLACEMENT BY FEDERAL AGENCY AS LAST RESORT

SEC. 206. Section 206 of the Uniform Relocation Assistance and Real Property Acquisition Policies Act of 1970 (42 U.S.C. 4626) is amended to read as follows:

"HOUSING REPLACEMENT BY FEDERAL AGENCY AS LAST RESORT

"SEC. 206. (a) If a program or project undertaken by a Federal agency or with Federal financial assistance cannot proceed on a timely basis because suitable replacement dwellings are not available, and the need of the displacing agency determines that such dwellings cannot otherwise be made available, the head of the displacing agency may take such action as is necessary or appropriate to provide such dwellings by use of funds authorized for such project. The head of the lead agency shall require that this section may be used to exceed the payment ceilings established in sections 203 and 204 only on a case-by-case basis, for good cause.

"(b) Whenever housing replacement as a last resort will result in the provision of housing for persons who are otherwise eligible for low income housing assistance, the requirement that the displacing agency provide suitable replacement housing may be met through such assistance as the provision of a certificate of family participation under the existing section 8 housing program pursuant to the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended (42 U.S.C. 1437f).".

CERTIFICATION

SEC. 207. (a) Section 210 of the Uniform Relocation Assistance and Real Property Acquisition Policies Act of 1970 (42 U.S.C. 4630) and its catchline are amended to read as follows:

"AGENCY CERTIFICATION OF STATE PROGRAMS

"SEC. 210. TREATMENT OF MINERAL MATERIALS ON PUBLIC LANDS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 811) to clarify the treatment of mineral materials on public lands.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am pleased to see the Senate take action on S. 811, a bill which will allow the Bureau of Land Management to dispose of sand and gravel deposits found on unpatented mining claims located on Federal lands administered by that agency and sponsored by Senator GARN and myself.

Currently, the Bureau of Land Management is unable to dispose of surface sand and gravel materials located on unpatented mining claims because of a legal interpretation by the Department of the Interior. This interpretation will not allow sand and gravel deposits to be sold, removed, or displaced even with the consent of a mining claim holder. However, the Forest Service interprets the same statute differently and does allow for the disposal of sand and gravel on national forest land as long as the mining claimant consents.

The irony of this situation is obvious. And the result of this policy has a detrimental effect. In Utah sand and gravel is scarce in the southern portion of the State where mining claims number over 120,000.

This bill will simply rectify the incongruousness of this situation by clarifying that "mineral material surface resources may be disposed of by all Federal land management agencies." It will also protect mining claimants by assuring that they will receive adequate compensation for any surface sand and gravel which they may need but which have been previously disposed of under this authority.

I appreciate the efforts of the senior Senator from Utah in seeking to rectify this matter, and the gracious efforts of Senator McCLURE to bring this matter to the floor of the Senate.

The bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed; as follows:

S. 811

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 4 of the Act entitled "An Act to amend the Act of July 31, 1947 (61 Stat. 681) and the mining laws to provide for multiple use of the surface of the same tracts of public lands, and for other purposes", approved July 23, 1955 (69 Stat. 368; 30 U.S.C. 612) is amended—

(1) in subsection (b) by—

(A) inserting after "vegetative" the following "and mineral material"; and

(B) inserting after the second proviso the following: "Provided further, That if at any time the locator requires more mineral material for his mining operations than is available to him from the claim after disposition of mineral material therefrom by the United States subsequent to the location of the claim, he shall be entitled, free of charge, to mineral material for such requirements from the nearest mineral material site administered by the disposing agency which contains mineral material substantially equivalent to that estimated by the disposing agency to have been disposed of from the claim subject to reasonable rules and regulations for the protection of nonmineral resource values including environmental values:"; and

(2) in subsection (c) by inserting after "vegetative" the following "and mineral material".

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

minimizing the trauma to the child abuse victim, especially child sexual abuse victim.

"(D) In order to improve procedures to protect children from abuse, especially sexual abuse, a State shall establish administrative reforms by law or, if possible, pursuant to law by administrative action, such as—

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the U.S. Senate has an opportunity today to reaffirm our love for children by focusing our attention on legislation addressed at curbing the frightening reality of child abuse in our Nation. One of the greatest blessings for people everywhere is the family. It is within our own family that each of us individually learn to care, to cope and to develop the strong sense of values which together make up the society in which we live. But tragedy strikes some families in America through the harm of child abuse.

Senator PAULA HAWKINS has brought the issue of child abuse to the attention of the U.S. Congress. Through her dedication, she has brought to the attention of our country the problems of missing and exploited children. Now before the Congress is her legislation, S. 140, the Children's Justice Act which is designed to assist States in reducing the trauma to the child victims of sexual abuse; improving chances of successful prosecution of legal action against child molesters; and, improving procedures for protecting children from sexual abuse.

S. 140 authorizes $12 million in fiscal years 1987 and 1988 to assist States in these efforts. That is a small price tag when considering the emotional turmoil that children and parents suffer when a child is victimized.

This legislation was reported favorably from the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources on July 10, 1985. Now I ask my colleagues in the Senate to support S. 140 as an additional measure providing families support and assistance when the tragedy of child abuse occurs.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, that a summary of the legislation be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF BILL

As reported from the committee, S. 140 amends the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act. It establishes within the Department of Health and Human Services, a new Federal grant program to assist the States in developing, establishing, operating, or implementing programs and procedures designed to:

(1) reduce the trauma to the child victim of abuse especially child sexual abuse;

(2) improve the chances of successful prosecution or legal action against child abusers and molesters; and

(3) improve procedures for protecting children from abuse.

The new grant program provides $12 million for each of the fiscal years 1987 and 1988.

The Children's Justice Act, like the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act it is amending, is designed to provide a financial incentive to the States to encourage their enacting additional child protection reforms. No State will be automatically eligible. All States will be required to improve their response to cases of child sexual abuse as a condition for receiving additional funds under this act. The legislation requires that the States must improve their response to child sexual abuse cases in the three general categories specified above. However, the States make the actual determination of what reforms to enact within those three categories.

For a State to be eligible for their allocation of funds under S. 140, the State must establish a multidisciplinary task force comprised of individuals and professionals involved in sexual child abuse cases. This multidisciplinary task force will make recommendations to the Governor, the State Legislature, the judiciary and others regarding the reforms needed to improve the response of such State to child sexual abuse in the categories specified in the bill.

The bill contains a provision which permits the State to utilize the recommendations of an existing or recently disbanded task force as long as its membership and functions are substantially the same as those called for under the act. The reforms do not have to be legislative. They can be administrative or judicial reforms or proof that the State has made substantial improvement in implementing or enforcing existing State statutes or procedures. The legislation also contains a provision which permits a State which has not enacted a reform recommended by their State task force in all three categories to submit a detailed explanation to the Secretary, who may, after reviewing the States' efforts, grant them eligibility to receive funds under this act.

The bill requires the National Center on Child Abuse and Neglect to compile, analyze and disseminate information about State statutes, programs, and procedures involving child sexual abuse cases within 6 months of enactment. To insure that all existing Federal resources are utilized, the bill requires the Attorney General, the Secretary of Health and Human Services and the head of any other agency involved in child abuse prevention and treatment to meet every 6 months to coordinate their efforts and avoid duplication. The bill directs the Secretary through NCCAN to develop and disseminate model training materials and procedures regarding child sexual abuse victims and provide for the support of research projects in this area.

The bill directs the Attorney General to modify the classification system by the Federal Bureau of Investigation to include the description of child sexual abuse offenses, the age of the victim and the relationship of the victim to the offenders and classify such offenses by using a uniform definiton of a child.

The bill amends the confidentiality provision in the Public Health Act which deals with federally funded alcohol and drug abuse prevention treatment programs to clarify that the Federal confidentiality statutes do not supercede the application of State or local laws requiring the reporting of suspected incidences of child abuse.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I am very pleased that the Senate is giving such expedited consideration to S. 140, Children's Justice Act. This legislation is long overdue.

The Children's Justice Act is needed if we are to succeed in enacting reforms in order to guarantee our nation's sexually abused and exploited children that we will heed their cry for help.

After years of fighting to get this problem acknowledged and discussed in public, we may have succeeded in increasing the public's awareness of this serious crime and it's long lasting effects upon its victims. We may have succeeded in getting people to stop whispering about sexual child abuse and begin to acknowledge that the crime does indeed happen in their neighborhoods, in their communities, and perhaps even in their own families. But the vast majority of the American public is still ignorant about how inadequate our administrative and judicial system is after the child victim makes that cry for help.

People are shocked to learn how few incidences are actually reported, how few cases are ever thoroughly investigated, how few cases are actually prosecuted, how few child molesters are ever successfully convicted and how few of these convicted child molesters actually are imprisoned.

Given the additional trauma experienced by young children who must undergo multiple interviews, depositions and questioning on such a personal and painful subject. Children who are often treated as if they had something to be ashamed of, rather than their abusers, is it any wonder why more children don't report their abuse?

Given the increased workload of child protection caseworkers, the difficulty in obtaining answers from a frightened and terrified child, the tendency to "burn out" in a high stress job, and the fact that the child protection worker's level of pay is less than a garbage collector, is it any wonder that many suspected incidences of child abuse are not fully and thoroughly investigated.

Given the misconceptions about children's testimony and archaic legal impediments, such as corroboration, prior competency and grueling cross examination is it any wonder that prosecutors are unwilling to take a case to court that is based solely on the child's testimony?

Given the misuse of the right of confrontation and to cross-examination by defense attorney's until it becomes not a method of determining the truth but a means to destroy evidence, the crucial testimony of the child, is it any wonder that so few child molesters ever get convicted?

Given the trend toward treatment and counseling of child molesters and the fact that so little is known about the effectiveness of these rehabilitative efforts, is it any wonder that many convicted child molesters use the criminal justice system as a revolving door and molest children time and time again?

These disturbing trends must be reversed. Teaching children to speak out and report their abuse is just a first step, we need to be able to guarantee them that they will not be further abused and traumatized by the administrative and judicial system after they make that initial cry for help.

Mr. President, I have been very encouraged by the interest and support that I have received from my colleagues on this bill. The bill was unanimously reported out of both the Subcommittee on Children, Family, Drugs and Alcoholism and the full Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee. Members of the committee, Republicans and Democrats, put aside party differences to work to develop a bill which would provide the Federal leadership and funding necessary to promote the administrative, judicial and legislative reforms needed to guarantee justice to abused children. Senators DODD, GRASSLEY, and METZENBAUM, offered excellent, constructive amendments which improved the bill. Senators CRANSTON, HATCH, DENTON and other committee members offered suggestions which were incorporated into the bill.

I would also like to thank the organizations that have provided our committee with information and their recommendations on this bill. The American Bar Association's National Legal Resource Center for Child Advocacy and Protection was particularly helpful, as was the National District Attorney's Association, the National Council on Family and Juvenile Court Judges, and the National Association of Attorneys General. The recommendations of the U.S. Attorney General's Task Force on Family Violence was utilized by the committee, as were the recommendations of the California Attorney General's Report and Recommendations on Enforcement of Child Abuse Laws. The spirit and advocacy of dedicated organizations and individuals to improving the plight of these abused children gives me hope that this legislation will result in changes in the administrative, judicial and legislative treatment of abused children, especially sexually abused child victims.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, today the Senate acts to address a most serious problem: the sexual and physical abuse of American children. I am pleased to join my distinguished colleague from Florida, Senator HAWKINS, as a sponsor of the Children's Justice Act.

Last session, I was a primary sponsor of the Child Abuse Amendments of 1984, restoring critical funds to child abuse prevention and treatment programs. The authorization levels for these essential programs had been cut in half during action on the Omnibus Reconciliation Act of 1981. Moreover, separate funding for the identification, treatment, and prevention of child sexual abuse was eliminated in 1981. Although the Senate acted to restore these funds, the magnitude and seriousness of the problem demands further congressional action.

The Children's Justice Act would encourage States to enact legislative and administrative recommendations designed to improve a State's response to cases of childhood sexual victimization. I am indebted to my colleague from Florida for accepting a provision I offered requiring each State to set up a multidisciplinary task force to make those recommendations necessary to improve the State's handling of child sexual abuse cases. These task forces will enable representatives from law enforcement, the judicial community, and child protective services, as well as child advocates, health and mental health professionals, and parents to sit down and devise new ways to improve the response of the legal system to child abuse victims.

Mr. President, each task force should arrive at recommendations focused on first, minimizing trauma to child victims associated with legal proceedings, second, increasing the possibility of successful prosecutions, and third, setting new procedures in place to protect children from abuse. Such a task force has already been established in my State of Connecticut. Likewise, similar task forces in California and in Maine have issued impressive reommendations designed to expedite court cases involving child abuse and to protect children by better coordinating the efforts of all State agencies involved in civil and criminal abuse cases.

The provision I offered in the subcommittee on Children, Families, Drugs and Alcoholism, authorized $12 million for each fiscal year 1987 and 1988 for grants assisting those States that have established task forces and enacted recommendations to carry out those recommendations. A State that chooses not to enact a specific recommendation made by its task force may still qualify for a grant if the reasons for not acting are delineated in writing for the Secretary of Health and Human Services.

In addition, I was pleased to offer two amendments on behalf of my distinguished colleague from California, Senator CRANSTON, during markup of the Children's Justic Act in the Subcommittee on Children, Families, Drugs and Alcoholism. One such provision would require the National Center on Child Abuse and Neglect to compile, analyze, evaluate, and disseminate information on child abuse programs and reforms to all States througout the country. Far too often, practitioners and parents in my State of Connecticut do not know what their counterparts in California and elsewhere are doing in terms of child abuse prevention and treatment. The other amendment authored by Senator CRANSTON would clarify that compliance with State and local child abuse reporting requirements supercedes the application of confidentiality provisions for patients in alcohol and drug abuse treatment programs. This amendment parallels one incorporated into the family violence legislation enacted into law during the last session of Congress. Both these amendments were accepted.

Mr. President, as founder and cochairman of the Senate children's caucus, I can attest to the public emergency presented by the sexual victimization of our Nation's children. By even the most conservative estimates, a child is sexually abused some place in this country every 2 minutes. One in every five victims is a child under the age of seven. And close to half of all victims under age 18 will be the targets of repeated sexual abuse.

As Senators heard at a children's caucus forum on sexual abuse held on April 26, 1984, child sexual abuse can trigger many other serious problems, some of them long-lasting. Police chiefs across the country report that 70 percent of all runaways have been sexually abused prior to making the decision to run. And, teenage prostitution itself is closely linked to prior sexual victimization.

Mr. President, cases involving the physical abuse of children pose just a serious problem. In my State of Connecticut, the death rate from physical abuse tripled between 1980 and 1982. In States such as Utah, that figure was even higher. For this reason, I am pleased a provision I offered in the Labor and Human Resources Committee markup of the Children Justice Act was accepted, encouraging States to improve their respective responses to cases involving the physical abuse of children as well as to cases involving sexual abuse.

In closing, I urge my colleagues to support this legislation to help States better protect children who have been abused or neglected from further trauma at the hands of the legal system. By enacting the Children's Justice Act, the Senate would take another important step toward curbing the tragic epidemic of child abuse in this country. I call for immediate enactment of this legislative package.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I rise in support of S. 140, the proposed "Children's Justice Act" which I have cosponsored and strongly endorsed. This legislation is aimed at encouraging States to enact reforms designed to improve legal and administrative proceedings regarding the investigation and prosecution of child abuse cases, particularly sexual abuse cases. Enactment of these reforms would help prevent the further victimization of children through an insensitive judicial process that fails to recognize the special nature of the crime involved and the additional trauma inflicted upon the children who are often the principal sources of evidence in the judicial proceedings brought against the perpetrators of these crimes.

Mr. President, before focusing on the provisions of S. 140, I want to pay special tribute to the chairman of the Subcommittee on Children, Families, Alcoholism, and Drugs, the Senator from Florida [Mrs. HAWKINS] and the ranking minority member, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD], for the tremendous bipartisan effort they have made in both focusing attention upon the need for this legislation and working with other Senators in developing a strong and effective approach to dealing with these problems. Last year, Senator DODD and Senator HAWKINS participated in a forum conducted by the Senate Children's Caucus on the subject of sexual abuse of children—a subject which has too often been hidden from public view. That forum played a critical role in focusing national attention on the full dimensions of this problem.

As the Senate coauthor with former Senator Percy of the 1978 legislation which established the first Federal program directed specifically at the problem of sexual abuse of children, I believe that it has become increasingly clear that what seemed to us in 1978 to be an important problem appears today to have represented merely the tip of an iceberg.

The growing statistics on the incidence of sexual abuse of children—regardless of whether the statistics represent merely better reporting procedures or an increase in the cases themselves—demonstrate beyond any doubt that more needs to be done by government entities at every level to deal effectively with the devastating, scourge of child abuse. I was pleased, therefore, to testify on May 2, 1985 before the Subcommittee on Children, Families, Alcoholism, and Drugs in support of S. 140 and to make several recommendations to strengthen the legislation and to submit specific legislative amendments for that purpose.

Mr. President, the Senator from Florida [Mrs. HAWKINS] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD] have brought before this body an excellent bill which will help stimulate these needed activities at the local, State, and Federal level. I am deeply appreciative to both of them for their willingness to incorporate my four legislative recommendations into this measure.

HISTORY

Mr. President, as the chairman for 4 years of the Child and Human Development Subcommittee on the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee—one of the predecessors of the present Subcommittee on Children, Families, Alcoholism, and Drugs—I have had a longstanding interest and concern about the problems relating to child abuse and neglect. In 1978, former Senator Percy and I worked together to develop the sexual abuse treatment program, legislation that was enacted in Public Law 96-266. That measure established a new small grant authority under the Federal Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act to help establish programs to provide services and treatment to children who were the victims of sexual abuse and to help develop programs to prevent such abuse. Unfortunately, the separate funding authority was eliminated in the 1981 budget reconciliation legislation, but I am pleased to say that we were able to restore the separate funding authorization in last year's child abuse amendments, Public Law 98-457.

The legislation before us today provides a new and much needed focus upon what happens to children during the judicial prosecution of child abuse cases, particularly sexual abuse cases.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE CALIFORNIA ATTORNEY GENERAL

Mr. President, at the time I testified in support of S. 140, I presented to the subcommittee a report issued on April 1, 1985, by a Commission on the Enforcement of Child Abuse Laws appointed by the California attorney general, John Van de Kamp. That report contained a series of findings and recommendations focused on how the criminal justice system could be made to work better to protect children who are the victims of sexual or other physical abuse. Those recommendations closely parallel the areas for reform suggested in S. 140.

For example, the California commission recommended that local law enforcement agencies in California establish specialized units or specially trained officers to handle all phases of investigation and prosecution of these cases—a concept which would fall within the purposes of S. 140.

A number of recommendations in the report focus upon the need for legislation to modify courtroom procedures to accommodate the special needs of child victims. These recommendations include:

Placing responsible limitations, within constitutional limits, on repetitive questions asked of child witnesses;

Pending explicit judicial authority to control the method of questioning of child witnesses;

Establishment of special rules for determining the competency of child witnesses;

Expanding the evidentiary rules relating to hearsay testimony to provide, with appropriate safeguards, for the admissibility of out-of-court statements of young child abuse victims; and Permitting the use of contemporaneous close-circuit televised testimony of very young witnesses in order to reduce the pressures and tensions experienced by these children in experiencing a typical courtroom situation.

OUTLINE OF S. 140

Mr. President, S. 140 would provide for Federal financial assistance to go to States which enact reforms along the lines outlined by the California Commission. It would authorize the appropriation of $12 million for each of fiscal years 1987 and 1988 for making grants to States for the purpose of developing, establishing, operating, or implementing programs or procedures for first, handling child sexual abuse cases in a manner which reduces the trauma to the child victim; second, improving the chances of successful prosecution or legal action against child molesters; or third, improving procedures for protecting children from sexual abuse.

As a result of an amendment proposed by Senator DODD, in order to be eligible to receive a grant, a State would have to establish a multidisciplinary task force on children's justice—like the California attorney general's Commission on Enforcement of Child Abuse Laws—which would review, analyze, and make recommendations for reforms needed to improve the response of such State to child abuse cases in the three areas I have listed. A State like California which had established such a task force within the 3 years prior to enactment of S. 140 would not be required to establish a new task force.

Mr. President, I believe that this basic approach would provide an incentive for States to enact the reforms needed while providing them with flexibility to design the specific reforms and programs that would best meet the needs of their particular jurisdiction. The bill would also authorize the financial help that is needed to get some of these programs operating.

CRANSTON AMENDMENTS

Mr. President, at the time I testified in support of S. 140, I proposed several amendments, derived from recommendations contained in the California commission's report. On June 18, I introduced legislation, S. 1320, containing three of these proposals. I am deeply appreciative of the fact that the subcommittee incorporated all of my amendments into the legislation.

STRENGTHENING THE ROLE OF THE NATIONAL CENTER ON CHILD ABUSE

First, Mr. President, I recommended that the National Center on Child Abuse and Neglect be given responsibility to play a more active role in helping States improve and reform their laws relating to the investigation and prosecution of child sexual abuse cases in a manner that will reduce the trauma experienced by the child victims.

Mr. President, repeatedly, the California commission stressed the need for development of appropriate procedures, training materials, and research into the various aspects of the problem of child abuse, particularly those relating to sexual abuse cases. One specific recommendation was for the State of California to investigate what other jurisdictions, both domestic and foreign, are doing in these areas and analyze the reasons for the effectiveness or lack thereof of approaches being tested in other jurisdictions. During the hearings on S. 140, witnesses repeatedly called for the sharing of information on what was being tried and what was effective. Jack Yelverton, executive director of the National District Attorneys Association specifically called for the establishment of a national network to share information and expertise on model programs, to report and track changes in case and statutory law throughout the States and disseminate this information, to monitor and evaluate changes in State and Federal laws based upon the actual case experience of prosecutors, and to develop model legislation based upon such experience.

At a hearing of the children's caucus in Los Angeles that I chaired on June 10, I heard a similar plea for clearinghouse activities to support local law enforcement efforts to deal with complex sexual abuse cases. It was suggested that there ought to be one telephone number that local officials throughout the country could call to get information and advice on how to proceed with these difficult cases.

Mr. President, I was one of the cosponsors of the legislation enacted in 1974 which established the National Center for Child Abuse and Neglect, and, as the chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Child and Human Development, I authored the 1978 legislation which extended the authorization of appropriations in that act. The Center was established to serve as just such a clearinghouse for information and to help develop the materials and procedures to be used by individual States and localities in confronting these cases. One persistent problem that has plagued the Federal child abuse program since it was first established has been its not disseminating information and research findings on a timely basis to those in the field who need to know what approaches and techniques are being tested in other jurisdictions and which of those are working and which are not.

A basic reason for this failing has been that the National Center has been buried in the HHS bureaucracy, with its funding diverted on occasion to support general discretionary projects supported by the Office of Human Development Services, rather than spent on projects focused specifically on the issues of child abuse and neglect. In April of 1980, the General Accounting Office [GAO] issued a report highlighting the weakness in the National Center's activities. That report—"Increased Federal Efforts Needed to Better Identify, Treat, and Prevent Child Abuse and Neglect"—noted that the "Center has provided little guidance and assistance to States and localities on effective approaches and programs to deal with abuse and neglect * * * Center officials had not clearly communicated to States and localities their opinions on promising approaches and programs even after extensive research and evaluation." GAO specifically recommended that to improve its leadership and assistance, the Center should be required to improve the coordination of Federal programs and resources, identify approaches and programs showing promise of success, and develop information on the progress of States and localities in addressing abuse and neglect.

GAO also noted that much of the problem arose from the lack of adequate support from HHS for the Center and noted prior efforts within HHS to divert some of the Center's research funds to other programs. Nothing in the intervening years since the GAO report was issued has changed much. Indeed, Congress was forced in last year's legislation reauthorizing appropriations for the Federal child abuse program to include provisions prohibiting HHS from using any funds appropriated under the child abuse act for any purpose other than that for which such funds were specifically authorized.

During the hearings held in the last Congress on reauthorizing funding for the National Center, the American Humane Association specifically recommended that the Center should emphasize its dissemination of information and knowledge in an assertive way.

Mr. President, it is not enough to have a National Center that serves merely as a repository of information; active efforts need to be made to share the information with those in the field who can put it to use. Without this kind of leadership and initiative to disseminate information, the individual States are needlessly left to duplicate activities and waste time and resources pursuing deadends.

The reported bill thus contains the amendment I proposed which would give the National Center a specific role and 6-month deadline to meet in the national effort to improve investigation and prosecution of child sexual abuse cases.

Specifically, the bill would require that, within 6 months, the Center compile, analyze, publish, and disseminate to each State information on the various approaches being utilized, developed, or proposed, including an evaluation of the effectiveness or lack thereof, to improve the investigation and prosecution of child sexual abuse cases in a manner which would reduce the trauma to the child victim and provide the States with other materials or information that may be helpful in making such improvements. It would also require the National Center to provide the States with model training materials and procedures to help ensure that all law enforcement, legal, judicial, and child welfare personnel are adequately trained to deal with child sexual abuse victims. Lastly, it would require the Center to provide for the support of research projects to assist in identifying effective approaches to improve the investigation and prosecution of child sexual abuse cases in a manner which reduces the trauma to the child victim.

Mr. President, I want to underscore the importance of the requirement that the National Center disseminate model training materials to law enforcement, judicial, legal, and child welfare personnel on how to deal with child sexual abuse victims. The need for this material has been stressed over and over, both in the Van de Camp Commission report and the testimony of witnesses who appeared before that commission. Dealing with a child who has been the victim of sexual abuse is a very difficult and very sensitive matter. The danger of further and deeper traumatization of the child by insensitive questioning or treatment is very high. Without adequate training, many professionals who want to help a child may actually do more harm than good. The judges as well as the lawyers who deal with these children in the courtroom setting need particularly to be sensitized to the special problems facing these young witnesses.

AUTHORIZING GRANTS TO BE MADE TO STATEWIDE LAW ENFORCEMENT AGENCIES

Mr. President, a second amendment I proposed to S. 140 which has been incorporated into the reported bill allows the funds appropriated under this new authority to go to statewide law enforcement agencies, and not be limited only to the social services agencies which currently receive grants under section 4(a) of the Federal Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act. I suggested this amendment because I believe that allowing these funds to go directly to statewide law enforcement agencies would be of significant benefit in helping to elevate the level of interest and attention paid to how the criminal justice system deals with child abuse cases. As long as child abuse is regarded primarily as a matter for the child welfare or social services agencies, rather than for law enforcement agencies as well, the changes that are contemplated under S. 140 are not likely to move forward with the speed they require.

COMPLIANCE WITH CHILD ABUSE REPORTING LAWS

Mr. President, a third amendment I proposed which was incorporated into S. 140 involves a problem identified by both the California attorney general's commission and the United States Attorney General's Task Force on Family Violence relating to a conflict between the general confidentiality provisions of the Federal drug abuse and alcoholism statutes, sections 290dd-3 and 290ee-3 of title 42, United States Code, and State and local laws which require all health-care professionals to report cases of known or suspected child abuse which come to their attention.

Mr. President, a full explanation of the need for this amendment is contained in my introductory statement on S. 1320 on June 18, 1985 which appears on page S8323 of the RECORD of that date (daily edition).

INCLUSION OF CHILD ABUSE DATA IN UNIFORM CRIME REPORTING SYSTEM

Finally, Mr. President, S. 140 includes the fourth amendment I had proposed which would direct the Attorney General to include specific information relating to child abuse in the FBI's Uniform Crime Reporting System. This amendment was incorporated into a similar amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRASSLEY], relating to other information and data collection mechanisms operated by the Department of Justice. These amendments should help provide hard data on the incidence and disposition of child abuse cases. The lack of this kind of data has been a persistent problem to policymakers attempting to respond adequately in this area.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, child abuse, particularly sexual abuse of children, is a very serious problem in our society. I am deeply committed to finding ways to prevent child abuse and child sexual abuse and to provide appropriate treatment for child abuse victims and their families. But we also must take steps to make sure that the judicial and the law enforcement aspects of these cases are adequately handled. Parents are justifiably reluctant to have their children subjected to a further abuse through the criminal prosecution of these cases. As a consequence, in some cases, the perpetrators of heinous crimes against young children are allowed to go free—go free to prey on other children. Better reporting and enforcement of child abuse laws can help deter potential abusers from engaging in the abuse in the first instance and certainly can be effective in removing them from society when they violate the law.

Companion legislation to S. 1320, H.R. 2791 was introduced in the House of Representatives on June 18 by my good friends and colleagues from California, Representatives DON EDWARDS, MEL LEVINE, and GEORGE MILLER as well as Representative DAN COATS who serves as the ranking minority member of the House Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families of which Representative MILLER is the chairman. I am confident that our colleagues in the House will move quickly on this important, bipartisan initiative.

In closing, Mr. President, I want to extend my appreciation to the staff who have worked on this legislation, particularly Robin Rushton of Senator HAWKINS' staff and Marsha Renwanz of Senator DODD's staff, and Susanne Martinez of my own staff.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act to establish a program to encourage States to enact child protection reforms which are designed to improve legal and administrative proceedings regarding the investigation and prosecution of the child abuse cases, especially child sexual abuse cases."

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

MYASTHENIA GRAVIS AWARENESS WEEK

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 183) to provide for the designation of the week of October 6 through October 12, 1985, as "Myasthenia Gravis Awareness Week."

MYASTHENIA GRAVIS AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I am very pleased that the Senate has moved with such speed to consider the joint resolution I introduce yesterday on behalf of myself and Senator METZENBAUM. That resolution designates the week of October 6 through October 12, 1985, as "Myasthenia Gravis Awareness Week." It is estimated that from 100,000 to 300,000 Americans are afflicted with this gravely disabling disease, a neuromuscular disorder that causes voluntary muscles to become weak and to tire easily.

It is the muscles of the head—particularly those of the eyes, the back of the throat, the larynx, and the respiratory tract—which are most prominently affected. It is a progressive disease—symptoms may advance irregularly, may get worse for a while and then remain the same for a period of time or even get better briefly. But over a period of years, there is always a gradual worsening of symptoms. The major danger in myasthenia gravis arises from progressive paralysis or infection, particularly that involving the respiratory tract.

There is no known cause of this disease, but it does appear that women are twice as susceptible to the disorder as men, afflicting the highest numbers of women between the ages of 20 and 40.

Mr. President, it is clear that much needs to be learned about myasthenia gravis. There is a continuing need to support innovative research into the causes, treatment, and cure of this disorder afflicting hundreds of thousands of American citizens. It is my hope that, by the passage of this resolution, the public's awareness will be raised by the programs, ceremonies, and activities which will stem from official designation of a national "Myasthenia Gravis Awareness Week", and that this will hasten the day when its cause will be known and effective treatment in all cases can be provided.

The joint resolution was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 183

Whereas the incidence and prevalence of myasthenia gravis present a significant health problem in the United States;

Whereas myasthenia gravis is a severe neuromuscular disorder, characterized by weakness of the voluntary muscles of the body;

Whereas an estimated one hundred thousand to two hundred thousand diagnosed, and over one hundred thousand undiagnosed, Americans of both sexes, and all races and ages, are afflicted with the disease;

Whereas the Nation faces a continuing need to support innovative research into the causes, treatment, and cure of myasthenia gravis; and

Whereas it is appropriate to focus the Nation's attention upon the problem of myasthenia gravis: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of October 6 through October 12, 1985, is designated as "Myasthenia Gravis Awareness Week" and the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon all government agencies and the people of the United States to observe the week with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate go into executive session to consider nominations.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DOLE. The nominations to which I refer are as follows: Calendar No. 366, Constance Horner; Michael E. Baroody, reported by the Committee on Labor and Human Resources today; Richard S. Nicholson, reported by the Committee on Labor and Human Resources today; Frank Shakespeare, reported by the Foreign Relations Committee today; John Gunther Dean, reported by the Foreign Relations Committee today.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, these nominations have been cleared on this side of the aisle, and we have no objection to proceeding.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the nominations just identified be considered en bloc and confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are considered en bloc and confirmed en bloc.

The nominations considered and confirmed en bloc are as follows:

(New Reports)

OFFICE OF PERSONNEL MANAGEMENT

Constance Horner, of the District of Columbia, to be Director of the Office of Personnel Management for a term of 4 years.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

Michael E. Baroody, of Virginia, to be an Assistant Secretary of Labor.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, we are now waiting, as I understand it, for drafting to be done on the budget conference report. I am advised that it appears that the House may act first—I hope quickly; then the Senate will act—I hope quickly.

The only other matter that I believe we can possibly dispose of would be the energy and water appropriations bill. If the distinguished chairman of that committee and the ranking minority member are ready to proceed on that matter, I assume it may be at least 7 o'clock or 7:30 before we receive the conference report from the House. I hope that if there is a desire to dispose of the energy and water appropriations bill, that can be done between now and that time.

That would take care of nearly every major item, with the exception of the South Africa conference report. I am advised that there is still opposition to that as well as the Genocide Treaty and one other nonmajor piece of legislation which we have not been able to clear.

So I hope we can complete action on the energy and water appropriations matter in the next 2 hours and be prepared to take up the budget conference report, and dispose of that within an hour, and then conclude our business for the August recess.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. ABDNOR]. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ENERGY AND WATER DEVELOPMENT APPROPRIATIONS, 1986

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, in just a moment, I shall make the following unanimous-consent request:

I ask unanimous consent that, when the Senate begins consideration of the bill, that is the energy and water appropriation bill, section 306 of the bill be withdrawn and that no other amendments dealing with the FERC rulemaking ability be referenced in section 306 be in order.

I shall not now ask for that, but I will in just a moment.

For the benefit of my colleagues, Mr. President, section 306 was inserted in the Appropriations Committee and reads as follows:

None of the funds made available in this act or any other act may be expended by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission for implementation of any regulations adopted by the Commission resulting from the Notice of Proposed Rulemaking issued May 30, 1985 . . . until the sine die adjournment of the first session of the 99th Congress.

What this says, Mr. President, is that the implementation of the presently pending notice of proposed rulemaking at FERC, be held up until adjournment of this session so that Congress has time to consider its ramifications.

Mr. President, the presently pending notice of proposed rulemaking is a very far-reaching set of rules dealing with the issue of natural gas. There is much feeling that FERC feels compelled to propose and adopt these rules with considerable haste because the presently used procedures dealing with transportation of gas and the special marketing programs, have been ruled illegal by the DC circuit. Fortunately, the DC circuit, knowing that FERC was dealing with a rulemaking, made the effective date of the illegality of those procedures November 1, 1985.

So that FERC has felt that the transportation aspects of the rule needed to be put into effect immediately. This haste, Mr. President, might possibly make waste in this instance, because this notice of proposed rulemaking is so far reaching. It deals not only with transportation, but also with block pricing, with take-or-pay, with rate design and with a number of other procedures and substantive rules under FERC.

Mr. President, the original proposed rule was issued at the very same time that the President's tax plan, known as Reagan II, was proposed. The proposed rule was issued May 30, 1985. I believe that was within 2 days submittal of the Reagan II tax plan.

Reagan II took the interest of almost everybody in Congress and most everybody in the energy community, almost to the exclusion of this notice of proposed rulemaking. As the weeks went by and people in the energy community had the opportunity to focus on the very far-reaching nature of these rules, they hastily began to prepare and present their comments.

The comments, Mr. President, were due on July 15, which was only 6 weeks from the issuance of the rule. Six weeks is a very short period of time in which to analyze these very extensive rules to make comments on them, and to present them to FERC.

There are, as I understand it, 6,300 pages of comments on this notice of proposed rulemaking, and 275 parties have filed comments.

Mr. President, it is an absolutely enormous job that FERC and the other parties have time to read and digest 6,300 pages of comments involving 275 parties before mid September. In my judgment, it simply cannot be done.

Mr. President, for that reason, I put in this amendment to slow down the process. There was an editorial in the New York Times, and letters written elsewhere saying, "Senator JOHNSTON is opposed to this proposal because it is going to hurt producers." This is neither my conclusion nor my motive.

Mr. President, I am frank to say I have not read this notice of proposed rulemaking. I simply have not had time. Nor has my staff, which is very skilled and very good, had time to read this and digest it. We have been involved in a budget conference. We have been involved in appropriations bills; indeed this is one of those bills right here. We have had 2 day's hearing, on these very far-reaching rules which few of us were able to attend. These rules have been called the "Magna Charta" of natural gas. The Magna Charta of natural gas is presented before FERC, and 275 parties are given 6 weeks within which to comment, and FERC thinks that in a period of about an additional 6 weeks they can read, digest, interpret and decide on 6,300 pages of comments. It cannot be done.

So, Mr. President, that is the reason for the amendment; to ask, in fact to demand that FERC delay their process.

Mr. President, since the amendment was filed, a number of objections to the amendment, all, or some, at least, good objections, have been made. First, our colleagues from across the Capitol have said that this is impinging on their legislative jurisdiction. Indeed, it is. Sometimes that is necessary. It is better to have a measure that impinges on someone's legislative jurisdiction rather than to make a huge mistake or a huge series of mistakes in a rulemaking.

If, in fact, this has the effect of severely limiting the supply of natural gas, which I am advised it will, then surely it is better to impinge upon someone's jurisdiction in order to delay rather than to proceed in haste and adopt the rule.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, I find substance in their objections. And, in the meantime, my staff has been talking to staff over at FERC and they assure us that they are not trying to proceed in haste.

Indeed, on this very day, the distinguished chairman of the FERC, Mr.

Raymond O'Connor, issued an opening statement in which he pointed out:

Rulemaking at the Commission is an open, objective, and on-going process. Perhaps it goes without saying, but it bears repeating that this process begins with only a notice of a proposal and then the public is offered a full and fair opportunity to review and comment on the notice. Then, the Commission, by law, must consider, weigh, and evaluate those comments and the record and its precedents and the requirements of law. Then, and only then, may the Commission consider making final decisions on whether or not to issue a final rule. Even after a final rule is issued, in the case of the Natural Gas Act, the public has a statutory right to seek rehearing. Today we are only at the midpoint of this process. We have made no final decisions and we intend to fully consider all comments and all issues in an open and deliberate manner.

The statement goes on, Mr. President, in the same light. So, Mr. President, in light of what the distinguished chairman of FERC has said, in light of the sensitivity of my colleagues relative to impinging upon legislative jurisdiction, and considering the fact in effect that we have gotten their attention, and have clearly indicated that we want to slow this thing down—long enough to not only allow these comments to be considered, but I hope long enough to refine the proposed rule and to reopen the process to ask for additional comment—I will today, Mr. President, ask that this amendment not be considered. Before I repeat the unanimous-consent request, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to enter into the RECORD a letter that I and some of my colleagues are writing to Mr. O'Connor on this subject.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE, COMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES,
Washington, DC, July 31, 1985.

Hon. RAYMOND J. O'CONNOR,
Chairman, Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: As you are no doubt aware, the Senate Appropriations Committee recently adopted an amendment to the energy and Water Appropriations bill which would have the effect of delaying implementation of any regulation stemming from your recent Notice of Proposed Rulemaking entitled "Regulation of Natural Gas Pipelines After Partial Wellhead Decontrol," Docket No. RM 85-1-000, until the adjournment of the first session of the 99th Congress. While it is not generally our practice to support limitations on the expenditure authorities of independent regulatory agencies, we felt compelled to do so in this instance in order to make clear to you and the other Commissioners our concern over the rate at which consideration of the NOPR is proceeding.

While we in no way wish to prejudge the merits of the NOPR, it is undoubtedly one of the most sweeping changes to ever confront the natrual gas industry. Our review of the comments filed on the NOPR indicates that many members of the industry felt the proposed rule to be exceedingly vague and the comment period unusually short. We share many of the procedural concerns expressed by industry. These concerns seem especially valid in light of the fact that two of the Commissioners present when the NOPR was issued have since departed the Commission.

We would therefore urge you to consider redrafting the NOPR taking into account the comments which have been filed, issuing a new proposed rule, and, thereafter reopening the comment period on the new, and presumably more refined, proposed rule. We are cognizant of the November 1, 1985, deadline for action on the new transportation program imposed upon the Commission by the D.C. Circuit as a result of the stay granted in the case of Maryland Peoples Counsel v. FERC, Nos. 84-1019 and 84-1090 (May 10, 1985) in its consideration of the blanket certificate transportation program and the special marketing program. If the above suggestion cannot be accommodated in that time frame, you may wish to formally issue the transportation provisions of the NOPR, while refining the remaining portion and resubmitting it for comment.

We feel that this would adequately satisfy both the concerns of ourselves and those in industry, and would help lessen the vulnerability of the final rule to legal challenge on procedural grounds.

Sincerely,

Mr. JOHNSTON. At this time I would like to put the request. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate begins consideration of the bill—that is the energy and water appropriations bill—that the amendment on page 33, line 4, be withdrawn, and that no other amendments dealing with FERC rulemaking ability as referenced in that section be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. CHILES. Reserving the right to object, I have a little amendment to the bill. This does not mean my amendment is not going to be in order?

Mr. JOHNSTON. No. This will not affect that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BRADLEY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Louisiana for his willingness to make the unanimous-consent request. I have a slightly different view of the issue than the Senator from Louisiana, but I believe we both are interested in having the issue deliberated in a way that gives a full public hearing.

Until last spring, the FERC allowed gas pipelines to discriminate against residential consumers by providing preferential gas transportation services to selected industrial gas users. On May 10, 1985, the D.C. Court of Appeals found these programs discriminatory and ordered FERC to replace the programs with nondiscriminatory gas transportation programs by November 1, 1985. FERC decided not to appeal the decision further and began work on nondiscriminatory programs to replace the ones thrown out by the court.

FERC developed the proposed rule that requires natural gas pipelines to transport gas to anyone who requests this service on a nondiscriminatory basis if that pipeline transports gas for any other person. For example, if the pipeline agreed to transport gas from a customer considering switching from natural gas to low-cost oil, under the proposed rule the pipeline would also be required to transport gas for a local gas distribution company, the local gas utility, which previously had no option but to buy gas exclusively from the pipeline. Prior to May 10, pipelines were allowed to transport cheap gas for the industrial user but could deny similar service to the residential user.

The FERC rule would also allocate price-controlled gas, so-called old gas, to historic firm customers of each gas pipeline. The effect of this part of the proposed rule would be to encourage pipelines to buy the cheapest gas available for resale to distribution companies and residential consumers. Today, pipelines are able to average the prices of high-priced new gas with their low-priced old gas. With the proposed FERC rule the pipelines will be able to do so only for existing firm customers. Pipelines will be forced to bargain much more aggressively for lower gas prices. Gas prices to residential consumers will be unambiguously lower under the proposed rule.

Mr. President, as to whether there has been sufficient time to comment on the proposed rule, FERC notified the natural gas community of its intent to propose a comprehensive reform of the natural gas regulations 8 months ago. Beginning last December the commission conducted a 4-month in-depth inquiry into these issues and took over 200 comments. Based on these comments FERC issued the notice of proposed rulemaking by May 30, 1985. FERC has had its proposed rule available for comment for another 2 months giving all interested parties another opportunity to comment. It received voluminous comments, the overwhelming majority of which commended FERC on the general direction of the rulemaking and urged the Commission to issue the rule with various suggested revisions. FERC is today and tomorrow listening to oral comments and will revise its rule in light of all suggestions received.

Here I would refer to the opening statement at the conference today by Chairman O'Connor that the distinguished Senator from Louisiana referred to, and I ask unanimous consent that his full statement be printed in the RECORD at this time.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OPENING STATEMENT—NOTICE OF PROPOSED RULEMAKING PUBLIC CONFERENCE

Good morning. I am chairman Raymond O'Connor. With me are my fellow commissioners, Anthony Sousa and Charles Stalon.

We welcome all of you to this hearing on the Notice of Proposed Rulemaking we issued in May on the effects of partial wellhead decontrol on the regulation of natural gas pipelines.

We thank everyone for the great amount of interest shown in the NOPR. We received close to 300 comments. The Commission is extremely pleased that all segments of the industry, the consumers, and the public have chosen to respond and participate in a comprehensive and detailed fashion to our call for comments on the NOPR. Your extensive comments, coupled with your previous participation in the six-month Notice of Inquiry process which preceded the NOPR, will be indispensable to our own review of the NOPR here at the Commission. We welcome the expertise and substantive advice of the public at all stages of this rulemaking process, including, of course, our public conference today and tomorrow.

I would also like to emphasize that many, many years of Supreme Court legal precedents and Congressional statutory authorizations have combined to assure that notice-and-comment rulemaking at the Commission is an open, objective, and on-going process. Perhaps it goes without saying, but it bears repeating, that this process begins with only a notice of a proposal; and then the public is offered a full and fair opportunity to review and comment on the Notice. Then, the Commission by law must consider, weight, and evaluate those comments and the record and its precedents and the requirements of law. Then and only then may the Commission consider making final decisions on whether or not to issue a final rule. Even after a final rule is issued, in the case of the Natural Gas Act, the public has a statutory right to seek rehearing.

Today, we are only at the midpoint in this process. We have made no final decisions, and we intend to fully consider all comments and all issues in an open and deliberate manner. As we have stated before, throughout this process, we are committed to upholding our obligations under the Natural Gas Act, the Natural Gas Policy Act, and the DOE Organization Act to assure that natural gas rates are just and reasonable, in the public interest, and not unduly discriminatory.

Because of the number of requests to participate, we request your cooperation on some organizational matters. As stated in the notice, this is not a judicial-type proceeding or evidentiary hearing. Speakers have been divided into panels. Each member of the panel may deliver a statement before general discussions begin. Before speaking, please identify yourself and the organization you represent, so that the reporter can properly record your name.

A transcript of the hearing will be, as usual, a part of the Commission's record and available through the Division of Public Information or it can be ordered from the stenographer in the front of the room during recess periods.

Many of you have brought copies of statements that you will make today. Please leave these copies with Bobby Isaac at the table at the rear of the room.

Anyone desiring copies of these statements may obtain them from the Public Reference Room on the first floor of this building during the day.

Finally, I note that we have two very full days ahead of us, so I would ask your cooperation in respecting the rather tight schedule under which we will have to operate.

Each participant has been allotted approximately five minutes. There will be time for questions after each panel concludes.

Mr. BRADLEY. I quote Chairman O'Connor saying, "Today, we are only at the midpoint of this process. We have made no final decisions, and we intend to fully consider all comments and all issues in an open and deliberate manner." That, to me, sounds like he is going out of his way to be fair.

I would also ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD letters to the distinguished subcommittee chairman of the House from a number of interested parties on the appropriate authorizing committee in the House.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND COMMERCE,
Washington, DC, July 26, 1985.

Hon. TOM BEVILL,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Energy and Water Development, Committee on Appropriations, Rayburn House Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In our letter to you of July 25, 1985 concerning efforts on the part of some members of the other body to limit the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission's (FERC) ability to proceed with its rulemaking on natural gas (Docket No. RM 85-1-000), we erred in referring to the Supplemental Appropriation bill.

As a clarification, we intended to refer to the Energy and Water Appropriation for Fiscal Year 1986.

Sincerely,

John D. Dingell, Chairman, Committee on Energy and Commerce; Philip R. Sharp, Chairman, Subcommittee on Fossil and Synthetic Fuels, Committee on Energy and Commerce; James T. Broyhill, Banking Minority Member, Committee on Energy and Commerce; William E. Dannemeyer, Ranking Minority Member, Subcommittee on Fossil and Synthetic Fuels, Committee on Energy and Commerce.

Attachment.

U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND COMMERCE,
Washington, DC, July 25, 1985.

Hon. TOM BEVILL,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Energy and Water Development, Committee on Appropriations, Rayburn House Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Some members of the Senate are considering attaching to the Supplemental Appropriation bill a limitation on the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission's ability to proceed on its notice of proposed rulemaking on natural gas (Docket No. RM 85-1-000). We are writing to strongly urge that you oppose their efforts to do substantive, authorizing legislation on an Appropriations bill.

The issue is a controversial one on which the Committee on Energy and Commerce is currently in the process of holding hearings. The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission is proceeding under their ongoing authority to protect the public interest under the Natural Gas Act of 1938 and the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978. Any efforts to direct or limit the scope of their actions through the appropriations process would be an unwarranted intrusion in the independent regulatory process.

Thank you for your assistance in this matter.

Sincerely,

John D. Dingell, Chairman, Committee on Energy and Commerce; Philip R. Sharp, Chairman, Subcommittee on Fossil and Synthetic Fuels, Committee on Energy and Commerce; James T. Broyhill, Banking Minority Member, Committee on Energy and Commerce; William E. Dannemeyer, Ranking Minority Member, Subcommittee on Fossil and Synthetic Fuels, Committee on Energy and Commerce.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I suppose the bottom line here is my sense that the normal procedures are being followed, the established processes are working. Acting under authority granted by law, FERC is making responsible action in response to the court order, and in the absence of any further policy direction from Congress. Anyone who disagrees with the final rule when it is published may petition the commission for a rehearing, challenge the rule in court, or seek legislation at that time.

Mr. President, I need not get into the history of the ill-fated attempt to pass natural gas legislation 2 years ago, but will simply refer to the time that legislation was being debated in the Energy Committee. The committee adopted by an 18-to-1 vote a provision similar to what FERC is now proposing in part A of its rule.

Finally, Mr. President, Congress can, of course, attempt to pass natural gas legislation at any time it desires. But relief from anticompetitive, discriminatory marketing practices and resulting high gas prices need not wait. In view of the court ordered deadline, I personally do not see any reason whatsoever to delay the implementation of this rule. A fair hearing? Yes. Unnecessary delay? No.

I thank the distinguished Senator from Louisiana for his leadership on the issue, for his strong feelings on the issue, and for his sense of fairness that he demonstrated today in propounding his unanimous-consent request. I look forward to working with him on the issue on the coming months, as I am sure we will.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I thank the distinguished Senator. I will make another comment since the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee is not here; that is to say, one of the things that I have suggested to Mr. O'Connor in my letter just put into the RECORD was that it would be possible—and I think advisable—to put into operation immediately only those provisions of the NOPR dealing with transportation.

The Senator referred to those in his opening statement. I think there is very little disagreement with those provisions. Those are the only parts of the NOPR which are time sensitive. They can withhold the rest of it for further comments before the FERC. That will allow the Congress, if it desires, to take a look at it. In any event, that has all been set forth in the letter.

I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of H.R. 2959, an act making appropriations for energy and water development for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 2959) making appropriations for energy and water development for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, and for other purposes.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations, with amendments, as follows:

(The parts of the bill intended to be stricken are shown in boldfaced brackets, and the parts of the bill intended to be inserted are shown in italics.)

BUDGET ACT WAIVER

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I move that in accordance with section 904 of the Budget Act to waive section 303 of that act with respect to the pending measure, H.R. 2959, as reported by the Committee on Appropriations and any amendments thereto.

This matter has been cleared with the chairman of the Budget Committee and on both sides of the aisle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. CHAFEE. I object. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I repeat my request relating to the budget waiver.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I am pleased to bring before the Senate today H.R. 2959, the annual energy and water development appropriations bill for fiscal year 1986. The bill as recommended by the committee provides $15,182 million in new budget authority for energy and water development through activities of the Department of Energy, the Corps of Engineers, the Bureau of Reclamation, and several independent agencies. The amount reported is $97,588,000 lower than the President's budget request.

Let me repeat that. We are reporting today an appropriations measure relating to energy and water development that is $97,588,000 lower than the President of the United States, Ronald Reagan, requested, and $90,513,000 below the House of Representatives passed version. Our recommendation is within the Senate allocation for both defense and nondefense discretionary spending and I believe it represents a fiscally responsible appropriations measure.

Mr. President, I want to also underscore the fact that within this $15 billion, $7.623 billion is for the military procurement and military projects for energy defense activities.

I always like to emphasize the fact that in the energy bill it is not all water-related or civilian energy items, but we are carrying in that bill the Basic Nuclear Warhead Program of the military department.

Before proceeding further, Mr. President, I want to commend all the members of the subcommittee and the full committee, but particularly the Senator from Louisiana, BENNETT JOHNSTON, the ranking member of the subcommittee.

As former chairman of the Energy and Water Subcommittee, Senator JOHNSTON has developed a mastery of these programs.

I extend again my appreciation to him for his counsel and assistance in developing this legislation. As in previous years, Mr. President, this bill is the product of a nonpartisan and harmonious working relationship among many Members from both sides of the aisle, and I expect it to receive overwhelming support in the Senate.

The committee recommendation is the result of long hours of testimony from agency officials and private citizens during 10 sessions of hearings and two markup sessions.

No other committee or subcommittee has more public interest and participation. We hear from numerous local and private groups and organizations and literally hundreds of individual witnesses from throughout the United States. In addition, there have been literally hundreds of individual requests from Senators and Congressmen.

While we cannot support all these items within the limited funds available, I believe that priority requests have been adequately addressed as well as the critical national priorities of energy and water development.

Mr. President, the recommendation before us today provides $3.4 billion for Federal Water Resource Development Programs. This includes projects and related activities of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, the Bureau of Reclamation, and the Tennessee Valley Authority. This Water Development Program provides capital investment funding—capital investments with lasting benefits to the Nation in the areas of flood control, municipal and industrial water supply, irrigation, water conservation, commercial navigation, hydroelectric power, recreation, and fish and wildlife enhancement.

As OMB points out, the committee recommendation is approximately $330 million over the budget request for the Corps of Engineers. This $330 million was added by the committee to offset a a proposed reduction in the operation and maintenance of existing corps projects and facilities.

The administration's proposed cuts could have closed down important water projects and facilities, including ports and waterways navigation facilities across the United States. In a show of budget gimmickry, and false budget savings, I believe these cuts were proposed by OMB with the clear understanding that Congress would continue to provide funds for operations of these important projects. After receiving extensive testimony on the impact of these cuts, the committee does indeed recommend a restoration of the O&M account. Even with the reinstatement of these funds, the committee recommends about $250 million less than the House for the Water Development Programs and nearly $400 million below the current year level of funding.

Much of the reduction in budget authority comes from the corps construction program as ongoing projects are completed and no new projects are initiated.

Despite the impressive benefits of these projects, the process through which these capital investments are authorized and made eligible for funding has been delayed to the point of creating a slow death to the Water Resource Development Program. The last major construction bill for the Corps of Engineers was enacted in 1970. This type of delay in the authorization process has now and will continue to have serious impacts in the 1980's. The Appropriations Committee is under increasing pressure to fill this void created by the lack of authorizing legislation and to provide project authorizations for some of these critical projects. The fiscal year 1985 supplemental appropriations bill includes a package of projects which, as a first step, will provide for a limited number of new starts and addresses the contentious cost-sharing issue. I hope the House will approve these important capital investment projects without delay.

In the energy area, the committee recommends approximately $11.2 billion for the Department of Energy. While most energy activities are maintained at current or slightly reduced levels of funding, there is an overall increase from fiscal year 1985 levels due to the amount provided for atomic energy defense activities. In energy defense activities, we recommend an increase of $293 million above the 1985 level. This increase is 4 percent over the current year level of funding, which is fully consistent with the Senate budget resolution recommendation for a 4-percent increase in defense spending. At the same time, the committee recommendation amounts to a $404 million reduction in energy defense from the budget request level.

As most of my colleagues know, I personally do not support any increase for these atomic weapons programs. That personal view, however, is not shared by the majority of the committee. In my view, even an increase of 4 percent in fiscal year 1986 is excessive.

Since 1981, the Nuclear Weapons Program has more than doubled in size. Each year, the Appropriations Committee has reduced the amount requested by the administration. Each year, we have trimmed the excessive appetites of the military planners and developers. We have accomplished these minimal reductions, when possible, within the guidance of the authorization committee. This year, the Appropriations Committee again has worked carefully to develop a recommendation which makes full use of all documents from the authorization process and provides an adequate amount for these activities.

In the nondefense energy area, the committee recommends about $1.8 billion for energy supply, research, and development. This includes slightly higher levels than the House for solar research, geothermal research, and nuclear energy programs. For uranium enrichment, the committee supports the Department of Energy's advanced enrichment decision to proceed with laser technology and expects to receive a budget amendment which will reflect current program plans. For general science activities, the committee provides $679 million, a reduction of $6 million below the budget request. This will provide adequate funding for the high energy physics and nuclear physics programs. In the Nuclear Waste Disposal Program, the committee trims by $19 million the large requested increase in the program. With prudent management, this reduction should not affect priority activities or critical milestones of the program.

Within title IV, the committee provides funding for independent agencies including Appalachian Regional Commission [ARC], the Tennessee Valley Authority [TVA], and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission [NRC].

The committee agrees with the budget request level of funding for the NRC. For ARC, the committee proposes a new appropriation of $71.8 million and a program level of $80 million in fiscal year 1986. The recommendation provides $50 million for highway activities and $30 million for economic development. The recommendation is about half the level approved in fiscal year 1985, and represents a phasedown of activities rather than the termination or zero funding proposed in the budget. For the TVA, the committee recommends additional budget authority of $90.8 million, which is $53 million over the budget and about $30 million below the fiscal year 1985 funding. Again, this level of funding would continue the phasing down of TVA nonpower activities in a more gradual manner than proposed in the budget request.

In conclusion, Mr. President, this is a fiscally responsible bill, a lean bill in all areas besides energy defense, and I urge the Senate to proceed with its early adoption.

Mr. President, let me add that we have some extraordinarily capable staff people on both sides of the aisle who assisted in bringing this bill to the floor. I would like the RECORD to indicate our deep commitment to them and our appreciation for their extraordinary talent and their professional skill.

Mr. President, I yield at this time to the Senator from Louisiana for any opening statement.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I concur with everything the distinguished Senator from Oregon said except the overly generous comments about myself which were not deserved; nevertheless, I thoroughly enjoyed hearing him say them.

Let me say, not because he said such nice things about me, but because I intended to say this anyway: The distinguished chairman has done a superlative job once again as chairman of this subcommittee. This is a product which I fully endorse, and I fully agree with his statement. It is indeed and in fact a bipartisan effort at the staff level and at the senatorial level. Our committee, I think, is united behind this bill. It represents a very good product. I endorse it fully and adopt the comments of the distinguished Senator from Oregon as my own.

Mr. HATFIELD. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendments be considered and agreed to en bloc and that the bill as thus amended be regarded as original text for the purpose of futher amendment, providing that no point of order shall be considered as having been waived by agreeing to this request.

This request has been cleared on both sides of the aisle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, a point of information: The motion which was just agreed to by unanimous consent is, of course, subject to the unanimous consent previously agreed to, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I thank the Chair.

AMENDMENT NO. 575

AMENDMENT NO. 576

(Purpose: To assure completion of certain recreation facilities)

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I send two amendments to the desk, one on behalf of Senator BUMPERS and one on behalf of Senator DANFORTH, which are related in subject matter. I ask unanimous consent that they be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? If not, without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will state the amendments.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. HATFIELD] for Mr. BUMPERS, proposes an amendment numbered 575 and for Mr. DANFORTH, proposes an amendment numbered 576 en bloc.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendments are as follows:

AMENDMENT NO. 575

On page 4, after line 2, add the following new language:

"The Corps of Engineers is directed to construct recreation and management facilities at the Ouachita and Black Rivers, Arkansas and Louisiana, in the vicinity of the Felsenthal National Wildlife Refuge at full federal expense using funds heretofore provided, using the $3.5 million provided for such purpose in this Act.

AMENDMENT NO. 576

On page 4 after line 2, insert the following:

"SEC. . From funds previously appropriated for the Clarence Cannon, the Secretary is directed to continue construction of the remaining authorized recreation facilities at the full Federal funding. Construction shall continue until completion, subject to availability of funds.".

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, these are two cases relating to the construction of recreation facilities at two projects, one in Arkansas, one in Missouri, which had been previously authorized, and have been underway for some time.

This is merely language to direct the completion of these recreation facilities in accordance with the original intent of the project authorization.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, the distinguished chairman is correct. The amendments have been cleared on this side.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, the Clarence Cannon Dam and Mark Twain Lake project in Missouri is all but complete. Unfortunately, one significant aspect of the project, promised to the people of the area when the project was planned, has been largely omitted. I refer to the recreational development associated with the lake—including the John F. Spalding Recreation Area, the spillway area, and about 25 hunter-fisherman access areas.

The need for the last of these items is particularly acute. The Corps of Engineers has built an excellent facility premised in large part on recreational benefits. But the ability of the people of Missouri to enjoy the lake has been severely compromised by the lack of access areas, particularly on the upstream end. It is my understanding that the corps can complete construction of the project—including the recreation facilities—not only under budget, but within the amount already appropriate for the project.

Mr. President, this amendment is very simple. It does not call for any additional appropriation for this project. It simply directs the corps to continue construction of the authorized recreation facilities at the Clarence Cannon Dam and Mark Twain Lake with the funds already appropriated to the project and not yet expended. Indeed, it saves money compared to the House bill, which appropriates an unneeded $1 million for this purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments (Nos. 575 and 576) were agreed to.

Mr. HATFIELD. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 578

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Florida [Mr. CHILES] proposes an amendment numbered 578.

At the appropriate place:

Provided, That none of the funds appropriated in this title may be used for preliminary discussions, staff briefings or meetings as defined in 10 Code of Federal Regulations 9.101(c) published May 21, 1985.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, this amendment is very simple. It is designed to achieve a simple objective, to ensure that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission does not retreat from full compliance with the terms of the Government Sunshine Act.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BOSCHWITZ). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the pending amendment be temporarily set aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. CHILES. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I understand there are concerns from people who wish to see my amendment and have not seen it. At this time, I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has that right.

The amendment (No. 578) was withdrawn.

AMENDMENT NO. 579

(Purpose: To increase funding for research on verification and control technology by $7,500,000)

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk on behalf of myself, Mr. HART, and Mr. BINGAMAN and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], for himself, Mr. HART and Mr. BINGAMAN, proposes an amendment numbered 579.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 25, line 13, strike out "$7,623,300,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$7,630,800,000".

On page 25, line 14, after "expended" insert the following: ", of which $101,075,000 shall be available for verification and control technology".

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, this amendment would increase the funding for DOE verification and control technology research to the level contained in the conference report on the DOD Authorization Act passed yesterday by the Senate. The level is $7.5 million above the amount contained in this bill.

Just yesterday we had an extended discussion on the floor of the Senate concerning the importance of verification to arms control, particularly for verification in the context of a comprehensive test ban treaty. The DOE verifications budget funds research in areas such as seismic detection of nuclear explosions, which is critical to a testing treaty.

One of the key issues is distinguishing nuclear explosions from earthquakes, and significant progress is being made in the use of seismic arrays to detect and discriminate low-yield nuclear tests from earthquakes. A seismic array is operating in Norway and negotiations are underway to install a second array in Finland. Upgrading the current North American seismic array to higher frequencies is one example of the proposals for additional funds in this area.

In addition, work is also proceeding in the area of noseismic detection of nuclear explosion.

The verification research program is not limited to detection of underground explosions. Detection of above ground testing, chemical and biological warfare verification and detection of the testing of directed weapons are all areas of immediate arms control concern which are included in this program.

Research in verification and control technology has high payoff, since improvements in verification can lead to new and greater opportunities for arms control and head off new escalation of the arms race. At a time when tens of billion of dollars are being spent on both sides for new weapons of mass destruction, it is little indeed to ask that we increase by a few million dollars—only about 8 percent of the total DOE verification budget, the vital research that can contribute so much to our hope for peace and an end to the arms race.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join the senior Senator from Massachusetts and the senior Senator from Colorado as a cosponsor of their amendment to increase funding for verification research in the Department of Energy's laboratories by $7.5 million.

Earlier this year at our initiative the Senate Armed Services Committee added $10 million to the Omnibus Defense authorization bill for verification and control technology in the Department of Energy. In the House-Senate conference on the Defense authorization bill, the add-on was reduced to $7.5 million, the amount we are requesting today.

Mr. President, the need for these additional funds were examined in detail at a March 14 hearing before the Strategic and Theater Nuclear Forces Subcommittee of the Senate Armed Services Committee. At that hearing the Directors of all three DOE nuclear weapons laboratories testified that additional funds were needed to pursue potentially high-payoff research in such areas as seismic detection of nuclear explosion, detection of the testing of directed energy weapons, and remote detection of nuclear warheads. Since that hearing Argonne National Laboratory has also proposed to use its expertise to pursue research projects on verification technology. With the additional funds we are proposing in this amendment DOE will be able to fund only a small fraction of these research projects. Our intention is that they do so on the basis of the technical merit of the proposals.

Mr. President, there is no doubt as to the central role verification issues play in all of our arms control negotiations and in the ratification process following successful conclusion of negotiations. We need to have a forward-looking research program on verification technologies, one that keeps pace with the research on new strategic weapons technologies. Otherwise, we could deny ourselves the possibility of negotiating verifiable limits on the testing and deployment of these new weapons in the future.

Our amendment will help support such forward-looking research effort. This effort needs to be given a higher priority within DOE's and other agencies' budgets. By adopting this amendment the Senate will be sending a clear signal of the priority it places on this research program. So I join my colleagues in urging adoption of the amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I have discussed this amendment with the floor manager as well as the ranking minority member, and I hope that the amendment will be accepted.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, the Senator is correct. This is within the authorized level and we will accept the amendment on this side of aisle.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, the amendment has been cleared and has been properly described.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate on the amendment? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment (No. 579) was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 580

(Purpose: To set aside funds for a report on research in arms control verification technology)

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SIMON] proposes an amendment numbered 580.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 25, line 9, after the semicolon insert the following: "the preparation and submission of a report in classified and unclassified versions, not later than March 1, 1986, by the Secretary of Energy, in consultation with the Secretary of Defense, to the Congress on recent developments in the capabilities of the United States to monitor compliance with any comprehensive nuclear test ban agreement which may be negotiated by the governments of the United States and the Soviet Union;".

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, this is an amendment that I have cleared with Senator HATFIELD and Senator JOHNSTON. There was a dispute the other evening about where we stand on verifiability of the comprehensive nuclear test ban. It simply asks the Secretaries of Energy and Defense to report to Congress on where we do stand. I believe there is no controversy.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois has submitted this amendment. We have checked it and are willing to accept the amendment on this side of the aisle.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, the amendment has been cleared on this side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 580) was agreed to.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HATFIELD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, if I may engage the Senator from Oregon in a colloquy, one of the items that is included in the House version of this bill but not included in the Senate version is $500,000 that the Corps of Engineers requested for a study for Alexander and Pulaski Counties, a study that was partially completed.

I do not ask the Senator from Oregon to commit himself to support that, but simply to take a good, serious look at it.

Mr. HATFIELD. I am happy to respond to the inquiry of the Senator from Illinois concerning this project. As he has indicated, it is in the House version; therefore, it will be a matter in conference. I assure the Senator from Illinois that we will look at this carefully. We do need to have some differences between the two bills in order to make a meaningful conference.

Mr. SIMON. I understand, and I thank the distinguished chairman of the committee.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, we endorse the statements that have been made by both Senators.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask for third reading.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 581

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Washington [Mr. EVANS], for himself, Mr. MCCLURE and Mr. GORTON, proposes an amendment numbered 581.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 29, line 22, strike "$95,568,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following: $95,568,000, of which $2,750,000 shall be available to conduct geographic and resource sorting for the purpose of identifying applications for hydroelectric licenses or exemptions which do not have the potential to adversely affect environmental resources in a cumulative manner,".

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, I rise on behalf of myself, Senator MCCLURE, and Senator GORTON to offer an amendment to H.R. 2959. The amendment would earmark $2,750,000 to the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission to conduct resource and geographic sorting for the purpose of identifying applications for hydroelectric licenses or exemptions which do not have the potential to adversely affect environmental resources in a cumulative manner.

On April 24, 1985, the FERC adopted a staff report outlining a methodology for review of the potential for adverse environmental impacts posed by multiple license applications for projects that could possibly be clustered together in limited geographical areas. The cluster impact assessment procedure [CIAP] is designed to: First, identify basins where there is a potential for adverse environmental impacts from clustered hydroelectric projects; second, identify target resources in particular river basins; third, determine the geographical extent of potential adverse impacts; fourth, determine the interaction of target resources and proposed and existing hydropower projects; and fifth, perform an environmental impact assessment of clustered projects for the purposes of preparing the appropriate NEPA documents for licensing the proposed projects.

The initial step in the CIAP is to identify basins where there is a potential for adverse environmental impacts from clustered hydroelectric projects. The analysis is based on legal filings or comments in individual licensing proceedings. For the purposes of determining which basins may be subject to CIAP, the FERC staff proposes evaluation of pending license applications. Pending exemption applications are to be included only where nonfishery target resources are concerned. Otherwise, applications for exemptions and preliminary permits and applications are to be excluded from CIAP analysis.

The next step in the CIAP analysis is to identify target resources in particular river basins where hydroelectric development proposals exist. The target resources are those which could be adversely affected by multiple hydroelectric developments. Again, they would be identified through legal filings or comments in individual license proceedings.

The third step in the CIAP is to determine the geographical extent of potential adverse impacts. Using the CIAP, the Commission could choose to assess potential environmental impacts on something less than a basinwide scope. The staff report suggested that clusters of closely spaced hydropower sites on particular rivers or tributaries may be an appropriate context for CIAP analysis. According to FERC, the narrower context could be justified on the basis of either the facts concerning the nature and geographic extent of the potential impacts, or reasons of administrative feasibility.

The fourth step in the CIAP analysis would be to determine the interaction of target resources and proposed and existing hydropower projects. The FERC staff proposes use of a computer-assisted matrix analysis to conduct an impact assessment. The assessment would determine the optimum relationship between energy production and loss in the quality and quantity of target resources.

Adoption by the FERC of the CIAP is a significant step toward systematic review of cumulative environmental impacts of hydropower development. But a lack of financial resources will prevent the FERC from conducting these environmental studies.

Mr. President, this amendment would allow the FERC to proceed expeditiously in the evaluation of license and exemption applications which may be environmentally benign. The amendment would provide the FERC with the financial resources to conduct geographic and resource sorting on rivers basins in addition to the Salmon River, ID, the Snohomish River, WA, and the Owens River, CA, where the FERC is currently conducting a full CIAP analysis. I believe it is appropriate to continue this process.

Mr. McCLURE. I ask the Senator from Washington: Am I not correct that this amendment would not retard in any way the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission's ongoing cluster impact assessment procedure for the Salmon, Snohomish and Owens Rivers?

Mr. EVANS. Yes, that is correct.

Mr. President, this amendment has been cleared with the floor manager and the ranking minority member, and I believe it is acceptable to them.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, as I understand the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Washington, the figure of $95 million is a matter the committee has supported. We, in effect, are earmarking the $2.750 million, which would be within that total sum for the purpose he has indicated in his amendment.

Mr. EVANS. The Senator from Oregon is correct.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, there is no objection on this side of the aisle. We are willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, this is a very worthy goal. They do not have a great deal of play in their budget, but I think this is the kind of thing we should investigate, considering the worthiness of the end that the Senator from Washington is trying to accomplish. Therefore, we will endorse the amendment and look at it very carefully in conference and try to find out how much they can do within the restrictions of their budget.

Mr. EVANS. I appreciate that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 581) was agreed to.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

SEMINOE FEASIBILITY STUDY

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I would like to thank my distinguished colleague from Oregon, Senator HATFIELD, for including my amendment providing $100,000 within available funds to be used by the Bureau of Reclamation for a feasibility study on Seminoe Dam and Reservoir for the purposes of irrigation, municipal and industrial water, and available storage in the fiscal year 1986 Energy and Water Development appropriation bill.

During the past year, the Wyoming Water Development Commission and the Bureau of Reclamation performed hydrology studies which indicated then an additional firm yield water supply could be achieved by enlarging Seminoe Reservoir. The Seminoe enlargement, in conjunction with the Deer Creek project presently being pursued by the Wyoming Water Development Commission could serve to meet a substantial portion of the long-term needs of the North Platte Basin.

The enlargement may also be necessary to store water from the Little Snake River water management project if trans-basin diversion is pursued. Flood control and water management benefits to the North Platte Basin could also be provided if enlargement of Seminoe is feasible. Because of these possibilities, both the State of Wyoming and citizens in Casper and elsewhere in the basin support this study, and have indicated a willingness to provide voluntary cost sharing in order to have the study proceed. As you know, the State of Wyoming has been a leader in voluntarily providing up front cost sharing to help finance vitally needed water development projects in our State.

The Seminoe Dam and powerplant are on the North Platte River about 72 miles southwest of Casper, WY. It is part of the Kendrick project in Carbon and Natrona Counties, and at present the reservoir has a total capacity of 1,017,280 acre-feet of water for the irrigation of project lands.

If the study proceeds on a fast track, as I am hopeful that it will, the possibility of enlarging the dam will mean that other needed water uses can be obtained from this same site. That is cost efficient, and it makes multiple use of a very scarce resource in our region of this great Nation. At a time when water resource development funds are all too limited, making the most out of what is already there makes good sense.

I would like to commend my colleague from Oregon for bringing to the floor an energy and water budget for fiscal year 1986 which is sensitive to the need for fiscal restraint. While each of us might wish for more, the budget deficit is a matter of serious national concern. We must each do what we can on a daily basis to exercise fiscal restraint in Federal spending.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I am pleased that H.R. 2959, the Energy and Water Development bill of fiscal year 1986 includes the $78,900,000 necessary to continue the operations of the Hanford Engineering Development Laboratory [HEDL] at Hanford, WA. HEDL is a facility dedicated to the breeder reactor program. The crown jewel of the U.S. breeder program is the fast flux test facility [FFTF]—the world's largest breeder test reactor.

Today this program is providing operating experience which surpasses the fuel burnup and reactor availability of any other breeder reactor facility in the world. It has proven the liquid metal reactor concept to be highly reliable by setting a world record of over 100 days of continuous full power operations. It has functioned at over 99 percent capacity factor. Futhermore, FFTF is providing extremely helpful data on fuel cycle technology, innovative safety features, artificial intelligence development and advanced core materials.

Despite the unparalleled operating success and the importance of the advanced breeder reactor program in the aftermath of Clinch River, the program has been cut significantly. The advanced breeder reactor program budget was cut by 18 percent by this year's administration request for a cumulative reduction of 50 percent over 2 years. The FFTF funding restorations provided for in this bill will mitigate the substantial job loss that was expected at HEDL as well as preserve the technology programs essential to maintain U.S. leadership in nonproliferation efforts.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask for third reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The assistant legislative clerk commenced third reading of the bill.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The assistant legislative clerk commenced third reading of the bill.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, before third reading is completed, the Senator from New Mexico asks to be recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

AMENDMENT NO. 582

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. DOMENICI] for himself and MCCLURE, Mr. THURMOND, and Mr. BINGAMAN proposes an amendment numbered 582.

On page 25, line 13, strike "$7,623,300,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$7,641,800,000".

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, this amendment has been modified substantially since I offered it in full committee and has been cleared with the distinguished chairman of the full committee and the ranking minority member.

I have a table to accompany it which indicates the places that these safeguards and security safety and environment construction projects are located and the amount of money that will be used to get them started.

This amendment moves in the direction of the administration's request in areas related to nuclear energy, but more specifically in the security environment and safety area.

Mr. President, my amendment seeks to restore funds to the level of the administration request for certain projects which I believe we all agree are ones which we should not shortchange. These are projects within the Department of Energy's defense activities.

Mr. President, this proposed amendment would restore cuts in the Senate bill for construction projects related to nuclear safeguards, security, safety and environment. These projects are also intended to bring certain facilities into compliance with environmental and safety regulations and upgrade their productivity. The amendment would also provide an increase in operating funds—over the Senate level, but still below the administration request—for nuclear reactor operations.

The amendment also includes a $24 million reduction in the funds available to the House level, for the procurement of enriched uranium for naval reactors—these funds are not needed because of a delay in scheduled fueling. The overall addition is $17 million.

This would change total funding as follows:

E & W Subcommittee	$7.623
Domenici amendment	7.640
Senate budget resolution	7.850
Armed Services conference	7.684
Administration request	8.047

Some examples of the kinds of projects this amendment would restore, include work on a plant at Oak Ridge which has been cited by the EPA for air and water emissions. If the problem is not corrected the State of Tennessee has threatened to shut it down. Another project would upgrade a facility at Savannah River so workers would be exposed to lesser amounts of radiation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the table to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I believe the chairman of the committee is inclined to support this legislation.

Mr. METZENBAUM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico has the floor. Does he wish to yield?

Mr. METZENBAUM. I have no intention of interrupting.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DOMENICI. Do I need a unanimous-consent request that the section of the bill that was previously closed that I amend be opened subject to amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator needs unanimous consent.

Mr. DOMENICI. I so ask unanimous consent.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I am objecting because I do not know what this is all about. Until I find out, I am going to object.

That is the reason I wish to have a quorum call in order that I may be further enlightened.

Mr. DOMENICI. Perhaps I could just tell the Senator.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Sure.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, in the committee I sought to add money for the environmental and safety parts of the nuclear program where we were under the requests of the administration. I have modified that down to $17 million which still does not meet the request.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Seventeen billion?

Mr. DOMENICI. Million.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Million.

Mr. DOMENICI. And we are still under the overall allocation.

This would be spread across this country, none in my State, but in the States of Ohio, Tennessee, South Carolina, and Washington, to start programs which make our present facilities more safe and more environmentally sound.

They have all been looked at before. We thought that we should start more of them than the committee started, and that is what this amendment does.

The reason I needed consent is that section of the bill has been closed prior to my offering of my amendment.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico apprise us as to what impact this amendment would have on the budget and has it been taken into account as far as the budgetary consideration?

Mr. DOMENICI. I say to my friend, it still makes this section of the bill under the authorizing levels that were reported out by our authorizing committee and the section of the bill that relates to nuclear is still under the budget crosswalk even with this addition.

Mr. METZENBAUM. When the Senator from New Mexico has concluded his remarks, if he has additional remarks, I would appreciate his putting in a quorum call or I will put in one, just so I may learn a little more about it. I do not intend to delay it.

Mr. DOMENICI. Of course. I have nothing further. I will be glad to share the information with the distinguished Senator from Ohio.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, the Senator is correct. We have checked this amendment. We have cleared it on this side of the aisle.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, this is a $17 million amendment for an item for which the Department of Defense has recommended $60 million, which means we have very carefully gone over every item and agreed to the minimum amount. We, therefore, have cleared it on this side.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment offered by my distinguished colleague from New Mexico, Mr. DOMENICI. The amendment would restore funds for various Department of Energy defense programs, and I am pleased to join Senator DOMENICI as a cosponsor of the amendment.

When the Appropriations Committee began markup of the Energy and Water appropriations bill, the House and Senate had not completed conference action on the fiscal year 1986 Department of Defense authorization bill which contains the authorization for the Department of Energy defense programs.

Unfortunately, the Appropriations Committee reduced several important defense programs below the level that has now been agreed to in the House-Senate conference on the fiscal year 1986 Department of Defense authorization bill.

Mr. President, the amendment offered today will not add funds above the level requested by the administration. It will simply restore the funding of certain very important programs to the authorization level agreed to by the House and the Senate in the fiscal year 1986 Department of Defense authorization bill.

Mr. President, I might add the fact that the conference report on the DOD authorization bill has already passed the Senate by a vote of 94 to 5.

I urge all of my colleagues to support this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 582) was agreed to.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HATFIELD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I rise to commend my distinguished friend and colleague, Chairman HATFIELD, and the members of the Senate Appropriations Committee for bringing the energy and water development appropriation bill to the Senate floor.

In view of the impending action on the conference report accompanying the first concurrent resolution on the budget, I will not insert into the RECORD today the usual tables scoring the relationship of the pending appropriation bill to the budget resolution, the President's budget request, and the House-passed bill. I will do so later at an appropriate time. I will simply congratulate Chairman HATFIELD for reporting an energy and water development appropriation bill that is under the assumptions of the Senate-passed budget resolution in budget authority and generally on track in outlays.

CALIFORNIA WATER PROJECTS

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to note that the bill before us, the fiscal year 1986 energy and water appropriation bill, contains $4 million for the Corps of Engineers to continue the Santa Ana River phase 1 studies. The area below the existing Prado Dam on the Santa Ana River faces the most serious flood threat in the State of California, in fact in the Western United States. But the House failed to include the funding requested by the Reagan administration and the State of California for this important investigation. I want to thank the chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee for the tremendous help he's given thus far and ask the Senator from Oregon for his continued support in conference to see that the Santa Ana River phase 1 studies receive full funding.

Mr. HATFIELD. I thank the Senator from California for his comments. I want to assure him that I am aware of the importance of completing the Santa Ana River flood control studies. I will do everything possible to ensure that his concerns are addressed in the conference.

Mr. CRANSTON. I thank the Senator for that assurance. There are several other California water projects which I would also like to call to my colleagues' attention.

King Harbor at Redondo Beach, CA, is a small craft harbor protected by a 3,700-foot-long breakwater. Most of the breakwater is 22 feet high, but a lower 14-foot portion inadequately protects the harbor. As a result, storms have caused nearly $7 million in damages in 1978, 1980, and 1983 and the inadequacy of the breakwater continues to pose a threat to public safety. The House approved $200,000 for the Corps of Engineers to conduct a study of raising the lower portion of the breakwater to 22 feet. Completing this study is a vital first step in providing needed protection. As the Senate bill does not include $200,000 for this study, I urge the chairman and the Senate conferees to recognize the importance of this study and accede to the House provision on this issue.

I would also like to mention the corps' coast of California storm and tidal waves study. Originally focused on San Diego County, the study has been expanded to look at erosion problems along the entire California coast. Southern Californians are concerned that if the study is funded at $750,000 as provided in the Senate bill, it will delay completion of the investigation and availability of important information. An appropriation of $1.5 million in fiscal year 1986 as approved by the House would permit the corps to work at full capability and undertake more research along the San Diego coastline without jeopardizing their contemplated study work on the coast. I hope that the chairman and the Senate conferees will take another look at the need for this investigation and in conference accede to the House on this issue.

The Corps of Engineers is currently engaged in planning for flood control work on the Guadalupe River in San Jose, CA. A project is needed to protect downtown San Jose from flooding and provide the basis for a downtown revitalization effort that includes a locally financed park along side the river. This work, however, cannot proceed until the flood control work is performed. Although the Senate bill provides $135,000 for Guadalupe River and adjacent streams as requested by the administration, this money is slated for work on adjacent Coyote Creek. I understand the feasibility study on Guadalupe River was completed sooner than expected. An appropriation of $400,000 as recommended by the House would speed up the Guadalupe project by as much as 2 years. I ask the Senate conferees to look carefully at increased funding for the Guadalupe River in conference.

Finally, I note that fiscal year 1986 energy and water appropriation bill includes funds for two projects of importance to Ventura, CA. The bill provides $1,640,000 for the maintenance dredging of the Ventura Harbor entrance channel and $100,000 for the feasibility phase of the ongoing channel navigation study. However, the Ventura Port District advises that only $1,540,000 is needed for maintenance dredging—$100,000 less than the Senate bill provides—while $200,000—an additional $100,000—is needed for the channel study. These levels are essential to assure the continuing operation of the harbor and to develop the remedial design measures necessary to alleviate the periodic shoaling that now plagues the Ventura Harbor entrance. Since a transfer of the money from one Ventura project to the other is budget neutral, I urge the committee to accede to the House position and make this adjustment in conference.

Mr. HATFIELD. I appreciate the Senator's remarks and I will certainly keep his concerns in mind during the conference and see what we can do to accommodate them.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I would like to call the attention of my distinguished colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to three waters projects which are of great importance to my State. Before doing so, I want to express my gratitude to my friend from the neighboring State of Oregon, for the assistance he has already provided to my State. Particularly for his efforts to restore funding for the Santa Ana mainstem project which is one of the Nation's most important flood control projects.

As the committee prepares for conference, it is my hope that the Senate conferees will give serious consideration to funding for King Harbor, Redondo Beach, CA. As you are well aware, this small craft harbor is protected by a 3,700-foot breakwater that is 22 feet high except for 1,600 feet which is 14 feet in height. This lower portion inadequately protects the harbor, which sustained nearly $7 million in damages during storms in 1978, 1980, and 1983.

Initial study of the situation by the Army Corps of Engineers indicates that the raising of the breakwater to 22 feet is in the Federal interest. The House has included $200,000 to allow the continuation of this study. It is my hope that the Senate conferees will recede to the House on this matter thus enabling the completion of this important study.

Mr. HATFIELD. I am well aware of your continuing concern for this project and as a result, understand the importance of the King Harbor study to you and to Redondo Beach.

Mr. WILSON. I would like to ask the chairman's assistance with a matter in Ventura, CA. I would like to know if the committee would object to the transfer of $100,000 from the corps' general investigations budget for Ventura Marina for fiscal year 1986 to the Ventura Marina breakwater feasibility study for fiscal year 1986. When added to the $100,000 already provided in the committee bill for this purpose, this would provide $200,000 in fiscal year 1986 for the study, which is the stated amount of the corps' capability.

As the committee knows, the goal of the study is to devise ways of correcting a problem of shoaling at the marina, caused by a deficiency in the corps' design of the breakwater several years ago. Should the corps request this transfer, the additional $100,000 for study would continue efforts to prevent future sand buildup. It is my hope that the committee will approve the transfer should it be requested.

Mr. HATFIELD. I appreciate the Senator's concerns and ask that the record reflects the possibility of the transfer mentioned above.

Mr. WILSON. Finally, I would like to bring the coast of California storm and tidal waves study to the attention of the committee. I appreciate the consistent support that your committee has given this project. As you know, this project is expected to offer great insight into erosion problems along the coast of California and ultimately lead to decreased erosion. As can be expected, this study has been extremely popular and been expanded to meet needs beyond its original intent. While I believe that these expansions are important, I hope they do not come at the expense of the original project. Therefore, it is my sincere hope that the conferees will give serious consideration to increasing the appropriation of $750,000 that has been included in the Senate budget.

Mr. HATFIELD. Again, I can assure the Senator from California that his concerns are well understood. While I cannot guarantee that each of these concerns can be met in conference, I do want my friend, the Senator from California, to know that his concerns will be given every consideration.

Mr. WILSON. I thank the chairman, the committee, and especially your excellent staff for the consistent support and assistance that you have offered as I try to meet the diverse water needs of my State. I appreciate your interest in these projects and any help you are able to provide during the upcoming conference.

Mrs. HAWKINS. I would like to draw the attention of the chairman to a project in Florida which I believe is deserving of funding this year. This is a reconnaissance study for deepening a portion of the harbor at Port Canaveral, FL, to permit transshipment of bulk cargoes such as coal, citrus, and lumber. The study is estimated to require $262,000 in Federal funds, of which no more than $80,000 would be utilized this fiscal year.

The study is authorized under prior legislation, and the Corps of Engineers has indicated that they have the capability to proceed on the study.

Mr. HATFIELD. Let me respond to the Senator from Florida by saying that I am aware of her interest in deepening the Port Canaveral harbor. I would indicate that the Corps of Engineers has the capability to proceed with the study from available funds this year and every consideration will be given to the funding requirements when the bill comes before the committee next year.

Mrs. HAWKINS. I would like to express my sincere appreciation to the Senator from Oregon. He and the committee have been more than generous to Florida this year, as they have been for many years in the past, and, I certainly hope, will be for many years in the future.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, Maryland's premier beach, Ocean City suffers from a continuing danger of beach erosion and other storm damage that threatens to undermine the foundation of 1½ billion dollars' worth of private ocean-front property investment and destroy a community that contributes millions of dollars to Maryland's economy.

The State of Maryland is conducting a comprehensive review of a number of plans, including those of the Corps of Engineers, State agencies, and private organizations, to ensure that Ocean City and its residents are provided adequate hurricane and beach protection. To be most effective, that review should include the Corps of Engineers' Atlantic coast and Assateague Island study. Unfortunately however, the study has elapsed.

In order for the State of Maryland to exercise the most prudent use of its dollars and achieve its objective to protect Ocean City, I feel it is necessary that the Secretary of the Army continue this study. This will ensure that the best information is made available to the State of Maryland to achieve its goal. Therefore, I request that my colleague, when drafting the final report accompanying this bill, instruct the Chief of Engineers to utilize available funds to continue the planning and engineering part of this study to help provide adequate hurricane protection to Ocean City.

Mr. HATFIELD. I would like to assure my colleague from Maryland that I am aware of the importance and urgency of this project. While this item is not included in the bill and I cannot guarantee your concerns can be met, I want to assure you that this matter will be given every consideration in conference.

Mr. SARBANES. I thank the Senator from Oregon for his assistance. This is a matter of great importance to Maryland's premier beach resort.

SMALL BEACH EROSION CONTROL PROJECTS AT THE INDIAN RIVER INLET, DE

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I want to commend my great friend and colleague from Oregon [Mr. HATFIELD] and his committee for the quick and efficient work that they have undertaken to resolve all energy and water issues and thereby insure that sufficient appropriations will be available for fiscal year 1986 energy and water programs. I am pleased to see that he has included sand bypassing at the Indian River Inlet. There is an additional aspect to this project which I hope he would consider in the energy and water development appropriations bill for 1986. Authorizing language indicates that stone revetment erosion control measures on the inside of the Indian River Inlet are also proposed.

May I suggest to the Senator that the Corps of Engineers fund this project under the miscellaneous section 103 funds for small beach erosion control projects during fiscal year 1986. The projects were designed to be complementary, and to fund one project while not undertaking the others would be inefficient utilization of Federal appropriations.

I say to my good friend from Oregon, Delaware's beaches draw thousands of tourists yearly to enjoy the beach, bask in the sun, and swim in the ocean. It is an important component of Delaware's primary industry: tourism and recreation. To undertake this project as soon as possible will insure the safe and continuous use of Delaware's outdoor recreational facilities and in particular those around the Indian River Inlet region.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I agree with my good friend from Delaware, that it would be a shame if this project were not completed in a timely manner. In the event that authorization is needed for the additional erosion control work, the committee expects the Corps of Engineers to complete the erosion control measure and the sand bypass facility, when that authorizing legislation is obtained.

Mr. ROTH. Am I correct that the Senator urges the Corps of Engineers to give this project top priority for consideration as a section 103 small beach erosion control project? I do want to remind him that this project should be completed as soon as possible.

Mr. HATFIELD. I do feel that the Corps of Engineers will do a good job in alleviating the problems at this inlet, and hope that the corps will take care of this work as soon as possible.

LORAIN SMALL BOAT HARBOR

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I would like to address the floor manager of H.R. 2959, Mr. HATFIELD regarding an issue of importance to me and the people of Lorain, OH. First I would like to commend both Mr. HATFIELD and Mr. JOHNSON for the fine work they have done on this appropriation measure. Unfortunately, they left out $1.8 million for the Lorain Small Boat Harbor.

This project is part of a vital economic revitalization effort funded by the people of Lorain and the State of Ohio. The State of Ohio has set aside $1.23 million in its capital improvement budget. The City of Lorain has set aside $615,000 for its share. The Federal Government would match these funds with $1.8 million.

This planned $3.6 million project will spur investment of $10 million in docks, launch ramps, boat sales and services, food services, housing, and lodging. Construction jobs will be generated with wages estimated at $5 million. The Army Corps of Engineers' cost benefit ratio for this project is 4 to 1, an enormous return for public investment.

In order to achieve these benefits the Federal Government must supply $1.8 million.

Mr. HATFIELD. My colleague from Ohio is aware that the Appropriations Committee is trying to keep the energy and water appropriation for 1986 as low as possible. That means some very good projects could not be included.

Mr. GLENN. I can appreciate the committee's desire to keep the cost of this measure under control. However, Lorain is suffering from severe economic distress. The development of recreational facilities appear to offer real hope for overcoming some of this distress. The Ohio Sea Grant Program has demonstrated the importance of this type of recreational development. According to Ohio sea grant, the charter and sport fishing industry alone have contributed $18 million to the economy of area surrounding Lorain, OH. So its important to remember what our President would say—"a rising tide lifts all boats."

If we are interested in improving the economy of Lorain we need to invest in its future. We have a responsible cost-sharing proposal here and there is enormous potential for private investment. I hope the chairman will consider this when the Lorain Small Boat Harbor is discussed in conference.

Mr. HATFIELD. That is an important point and I am sure that my colleague from Ohio is aware that I will consider all his points when discussing this project in conference.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, on September 12 and 13, 1977, the worst rain of record fell on Kansas City, MO—16 inches in 24 hours. Brush Creek, a tributary of the Blue River that passes through the heart of Kansas City, rapidly rose above its banks with devastating results, killing 12 people and causing millions of dollars in damages.

The Corps of Engineers has recommended a $15 million project along the middle stretch of Brush Creek, of which the city's share would be $5 million. Kansas City has asked for a larger project, with all of the additional work upstream and downstream to be financed by the city. In short, a $36 million flood control project would be built with a $10 million Federal contribution. Authorization of the project is included in the omnibus water project bills pending in both the House and the Senate.

Pending that authorization, continued planning and engineering work can proceed on the larger project. The House has provided $350,000 for that purpose; the Appropriations Committee provided only $100,000. The local contribution to this project is extraordinary; the need for it is urgent. Can the distinguished Senator from Oregon, the chairman of the committee, provide me with any indication of his intentions on this matter in conference?

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri has stated the arguments for this project in a forceful way. In view of the amount of money involved, I can assure the Senator that I will take a careful look at this matter in conference.

Mr. DANFORTH. I thank the Senator. Mr. President, on another matter, I want to commend the Appropriations Committee for supporting the budget request of the President with regard to the management of surplus radioactively contaminated Department of Energy facilities. The Senate figure, like the budget figure, for this program is $39 million; the House figure is $5 million less.

In my own State of Missouri, we have been trying for some time to encourage the cleanup of a 230-acre site at Weldon Spring, used by the Army during World War II for production of TNT and by the Atomic Energy Commission from 1957 to 1967 for processing of uranium and thorium ore concentrates. As of October 1, the site will be wholly in the hands of the Department of Energy, and a draft environmental impact statement for cleanup is expected in March.

If the House figure is adopted in conference for this program, it would have a major impact on the Weldon Spring cleanup. I am told that work on the contaminated uranium feed materials plant would be delayed for another year as a result. Such a delay would be a serious blow to the people of the area, especially those whose children attend high school just half a mile away. I strongly urge the chairman to do everything he can to preserve the Senate position on this matter.

Mr. HATFIELD. The Senator certainly has my assurance in that regard.

PORT AUSTIN HARBOR BREAKWATER

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, my colleague from Michigan, Senator LEVIN, and I are particularly concerned about the need for construction of a northeast breakwall at Port Austin Harbor in Michigan. This harbor, as the House report notes, is an important refuge for small craft. However, the existing breakwall is not sufficient to protect the inner harbor. The House has provided $2.8 million to modify the existing harbor-of-refuge. I would like to ask the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee to give this project favorable consideration during the conference on this legislation.

Mr. HATFIELD. I would like to assure my colleagues from Michigan that we will give their request all due consideration.

Mr. LEVIN. I would just like to add my personal support for this project and to point out that the House report indicates that this project should be funded at full Federal expense. This is a modification of an existing authorized project. The entire local cash contribution has already been provided as part of the existing project. I hope that the chairman of the Appropriations Committee and conferees to this legislation will take that into consideration in their deliberations.

Mr. HATFIELD. I thank my colleagues for their interest in this project and will keep their concerns in mind when the conference on this legislation convenes in September.

CONTINUOUS ELECTRON BEAM ACCELERATOR FACILITY

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, I commend you and other members of the Appropriations Committee for bringing an energy and water development appropriations bill, fiscal year 1986, to the floor which is $97.5 million below the budget estimates and $90.5 million below the House bill. I wish to have a clear understanding that within the activities of the nuclear physics budget for which the committee has provided $172.9 million, it is the committee's intention that $5 million is to be provided for the Continuous Electron Beam Accelerator Facility for research and development, and advanced architectural and engineering design work to better define the CEBAF project's scope, schedule and total cost, and for other necessary activities in support of the project.

Mr. HATFIELD. Senator WARNER, you are correct. It is the intention of this committee to approve the administration's request of $5 million for the Continuous Electron Beam Accelerator Facility for advanced architectural and engineering design work in fiscal year 1986.

Mr. WARNER. I thank my distinguished colleague from Oregon for clarifying this point.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, during the markup of this bill the chairman agreed to revisit the allocations for the various participants in the Inertial Confinement Fusion Program. I believe our staffs have done that, and they have found that the Senate bill should have had the figure for Los Alamos at the same level as the House—that is $38 million. I would like to ask the chairman if that is his understanding?

Mr. HATFIELD. I believe the Senator is correct. Our report should have read $38 million rather than $33 million.

Mr. DOMENICI. I hope the chairman will have that in mind when he begins his conference negotiations.

Mr. HATFIELD. The Senator can be assured that I will.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, as we debate the energy and water appropriations bill, in particular the funding for the Tennessee Valley Authority, I believe it is important that our colleagues understand just how TVA works. There has been considerable misunderstanding about the nature of TVA's federally funded efforts, and about how TVA provides electricity to its service area.

The Senate Environment and Public Works Subcommittee on Regional and Community Development has recently been holding hearings to look at TVA and its programs. These have been informative and constructive efforts that have, I believe, shown the exceptional national benefits TVA is producing with appropriated funds.

Any expenditure of Federal tax dollars should be subject to careful oversight in the Congress. And we should insist on accountability for those who manage these dollars. When I served in the House, I renewed the Tennessee Valley caucus and held extensive meetings between Members of Congress and the TVA Board to examine a variety of problems then facing TVA ratepayers—the financial difficulties in the nuclear power program, various management initiatives, environmental problems, and rates in general.

For those of us in the Congress and in the valley, these problems are not new. We have been involved in oversight on TVA activities for as long as the agency has existed.

We have continually been pleasantly surprised that TVA is forthcoming, candid, and as eager as we in the Congress are to get to the bottom of whatever issue is at hand. During the recent hearings, TVA's Board and its managers have been straightforward advocates of public power, of their ratepayers, and of the innovative Federal programs they operate for our country.

I also had the opportunity in the House to serve on the principal committees involved in energy and environmental matters. It was always striking to me that, when we sought an example of outstanding performance in nuclear waste handling, renewal energy and energy conservation, acid rain solutions, new coal burning technologies, water resource management, and a wide range of other energy and environmental technologies, invariably it was TVA which presented the model.

The ability of utilities and the Federal Government to rapidly implement a home insulation program in the late 1970's was made possible by TVA's pioneer work in this area. And this is but one of many such examples of efficient technology transfer from TVA to other utilities, as well as Federal, State and local government programs, to farm enterprises, and a wide range of businesses and educational institutions.

Clearly, the Tennessee Valley Authority has, in its half-century of serving electricity consumers in the Southeast, given this country much more than a hugely successful experiment in public power and economic development. The TVA has become a major laboratory for this country's efforts to find solutions to many tough energy and environmental problems.

As we look at the TVA programs covered in the energy and water bill before us today, I would like to take the opportunity to go over a few important points and try to clarify several key issues that might be causing some confusion.

TAXPAYER SUBSIDIES TO TVA

It has been suggested in the recent hearings, and several years ago by the Director of OMB that TVA's access to the Federal Financing Bank amounts to a taxpayer subsidy of TVA electric rates.

Mr. President, I wish there was some way we could put this issue to rest once and for all. The fact is, not one dime of taxpayer funds has ever gone to subsidize a TVA bond issue through the FFB. Moreover, the taxpayer has actually benefited from TVA's borrowing through the FFB as a result of the one-eighth percent fee it pays FFB on these issues.

Since it began using FFB authority for its borrowing, TVA has paid more than $100 million to the U.S. Treasury in these fees. There is simply no way that TVA's borrowing authority from the FFB can be considered a subsidy. A good deal for TVA ratepayers? Absolutely. But a good deal for the taxpayers, too.

However, removing TVA's eligibility for FFB financing would have cost TVA ratepayers between $100 million to as much as $1.5 billion in added borrowing costs since 1974—based on a 25 to 1.5-percent increase over FFB-issued rates. That would have translated into significant rate increases. And taking TVA out of the FFB Program would not have saved taxpayers one thin dime.

I want to also briefly address a memorandum from David Stockman about TVA's so-called unfair advantages, that TVA's exemption from property taxes gave it some special advantage. The fact is, TVA pays taxes in the form of in-lieu-of-tax payments to local governments based upon the value of property. These payments are as valuable to local governments as property taxes. So it is not accurate to say that TVA acquires some advantage through tax avoidance.

FINANCING FEDERAL NONPOWER PROGRAMS WITH POWER REVENUES

The question has been asked: Why could TVA not simply pay for these programs out of its power revenues? There are two good reasons why this is not only inappropriate but possibly illegal.

When the Congress created the TVA, it very wisely declared that revenues from TVA's Power Program be used solely for those activities which meet TVA demand for electricity. This was done to prevent any kind of cross-subsidy from electricity users to other residents in the valley. That was a smart, fair provision, and I think it still works.

Moreover, TVA's bonding covenants prohibit the use of power revenues for nonpower activities. So it should be clear that TVA should not—it cannot—use power revenues to fund its programs in fertilizer development, natural resource management, and economic development. These are regionally conducted programs, but they benefit everyone in not only the Tennessee Valley but the entire country, whether they use TVA electricity or not.

TVA BOARD AUTONOMY

TVA Directors are appointed by the President, confirmed by the Senate. The Board meets publicly twice a month. Compare that to such regulatory agencies as the ICC, which has hardly met at all over the past several years, and the FCC, FERC, and so on, and I believe you will see that TVA has a remarkable record of public access to its decisionmaking.

The issue of TVA accountability has always been openly debated in the valley. As I mentioned earlier, I have vigorously encouraged oversight by the Congress and people in the valley.

So, while TVA's Board does have statutory autonomy to set rates and make critical management decisions, I would strongly suggest that it has done so in the open, fully accountable to the Congress and its ratepayers.

There is a tension here. On the one hand we give TVA Directors the freedom to make decisions, and from that we get a streamlined process that produces efficiencies not possible in traditional Federal agency organizations. And on the other hand we want TVA to be accountable to its ratepayers. I believe we have both in TVA's organizational makeup. And while some of TVA's mistakes might not have occurred had it been a typical private utility or simply another Federal agency, I would submit that a much greater number of measurable benefits and efficiencies would have been lost had TVA been encumbered with a more restrictive management structure.

TVA'S PLANNING MISTAKES IN ITS NUCLEAR PROGRAM

It has been suggested that TVA's mistake in failing to forecast dramatic drop in electricity demand is a substantial indictment of its management and of TVA itself.

The fact is that TVA was far from unique in failing to predict the decoupling of growth and energy demand that occurred in the late 1970's. Four years ago I chaired House Science Subcommittee hearings on energy demand forecasting. The testimony at those hearings was troubling in that energy forecasters were far off the mark. But the hearings also revealed that all the forecasters erred—not only TVA, which had had a remarkably strong record until 1973, but also Shell, Exxon, the IOU's, and the Federal Government.

For instance, Henry Kelly of the Office of Technology Assessment testified that industrywide forecasts in 1973 overestimated national demand in 1980 by 700 billion kwh—the equivalent of nearly 140 large coal or nuclear plants. The 1990 estimates were even more dramatically off the mark—by nearly 400 large plants.

So it is wrong to suggest that TVA was somehow especially negligent in its planning for future electricity demand when it contracted to expand its nuclear plant operations.

No one in the valley is pleased that TVA committed to build nuclear plants it ultimately did not need. As ratepayers we will pay for that mistake. But TVA was not unique in not having a crystal ball when it made its building decisions in the early 1970's. And the Directors have done everything possible to soften the blow of that mistake for its ratepayers, and they have done it without asking the taxpayers for a bailout.

I strongly support this vigorous debate about TVA's activities. When we have the kind of successful programs TVA has—when we've created the kind of national and international yardstick for excellence TVA has created—when we've produced an effective laboratory for working out the problems in natural resource management, air and water quality, fertilizer development, environmental education—we should make these successes known.

Thank you.

APPALACHIAN REGIONAL COMMISSION

Mr. President, the Appalachian Regional Commission has made a difference in the everyday lives of millions. The rate of job growth in the rural areas of Appalachia would not have been what it has been without the ARC. And, the health of the region's young adults would not be what it is today if it were not for the contributions of the ARC to the good health of children.

The ARC has given hope to today's children and tomorrow's adults. It has meant an improvement in the health and quality of life of children and youths through nutrition, community centers and educational efforts. And, it has given hope to young adults as they enter the job market by opening up opportunities with new factories and developing the public facilities much of America takes for granted.

There has never been a better example of the new federalism than the ARC. Projects are funded by Washington, coordinated by the States, and planned and conducted at the local level, almost always with substantial local and private money. I hope the administration will not pursue a penny-wise and pound-foolish strategy and continue to press for the elimination of the ARC. There has been a lot of progress, but there is much more to be done, and many more benefits to be gained from continuing to invest in the region.

The region has seen a reversal of trends in outmigration that took two world wars, a depression, and several decades to create. It has taken only 15 years to come this far. Let's not give up now.

The budget dilemma has the ARC caught on its horns. The Senate approved a budget by one vote which does not fund ARC. An amendment which I cosponsored failed narrowly to return most ARC funds. The House reduced but continued ARC funds. Negotiations have concluded which ironed out a compromise on the entire budget from A to Z. Negotiations were intense, but a reasonable compromise was crafted.

Let's accept the spirit of compromise, and accept the committee's recommendation. Let's not go against the tide which is working its way toward a responsible compromise. I urge my colleagues to accept the committee recommendation as the best possible response, considering the many different views.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I believe there is an urgent need for the continuation of the ARC Program at an effective level. This is an excellent program—a program of proven worth and accomplishment for the Appalachian States. That is why I offered, and the Appropriations Committee accepted, my amendment to add $50 million to this fiscal year 1986 energy and water development appropriation bill for construction of Appalachian highways.

The Appalachian States are those 13 States with the most fragile economic bases, hardest hit by economic recession, and the slowest to recover as the economy turns around.

The $81.8 million which the Appropriations Committee has recommended for ARC programs in this bill is not a Federal give away. It is not a handout. It is an investment in the economic future of a region of this Nation that has a proven need. Furthermore, the committee report language directs that the local share of any ARC area development programs must be at least 70 percent, except in distressed counties where the cost share is 50/50.

The need for the ARC and its programs in West Virginia continues to be of the utmost importance. Reductions in the Environmental Protection Agency's water and sewer grants program, farmers home rural development programs, urban development action grants, and the programs of the economic development administration have combined to put a great strain on community and infrastructure development in West Virginia at a time when the State does not have the resources to assume these additional financial responsibilities.

The ARC highway program is essential to the future economic health of the region. Completion of the corridor G highway between Charleston and Williamson on the Kentucky border—which can continue only with ARC help—is especially important. The new highway will substantially reduce travel time, thereby enhancing commerce in areas of southern West Virginia which are presently experiencing exceptionally high levels of unemployment. Without this type of improvement in the transportation network, this area will be condemned to poor economic development prospects for the foreseeable future.

Conversely, completed segments of the Appalachian Highway System have helped to attract hundreds of new businesses which have added more than 430,000 new jobs according to a study conducted in 1981. Failure to complete construction which is now under way on corridor G and other segments of the highway system would preclude the realization of such benefits in the future and largely waste the investment to date in partial construction of these roads.

Mr. Chairman, in my home State of West Virginia, unemployment was 15.9 percent earlier this year, down from a high of 21 percent a few months back. As late as May of this year, unemployment in Logan and Mingo counties—which could derive great economic assistance from the completion of the corridor G highway network—continued above 15 percent.

The construction of corridor G and other Appalachian highways is extremely expensive because of the mountainous terrain. Interstate highways throughout the United States have historically averaged about $2.2 million per mile while the figure for Appalachia is more than double that at $5.5 million per mile. So, interstate highway funding does not go as far in my State of West Virginia as it would in say New England or New Mexico, for example.

The ARC highways are especially important to the economy of the region because nearly 50 percent of the present highway system is used to haul coal from the hills and valleys of Appalachia. These Appalachian highways have national significance because 25.5 percent of U.S. coal reserves are located within the ARC boundaries.

Since 1982, when the ARC authorization expired, the program has been kept alive—at least at a 50-percent reduced level—through the appropriations process, by those of us who were able to recognize the tremendous benefits derived by so many of our citizens from the program and its leveraging abilities. We must not now—when the need remains so critical—so severely cripple this essential program that we abandon those of our citizens who have virtually no alternative source of help offering hope for the future.

I fully agree with the need to balance the Federal budget and to reduce the deficit. However, I believe that the ARC represents a necessary investment in the future of Appalachia. I do not believe we can afford to abandon those irreplaceable programs of proven effectiveness, which are relatively small, and which leverage substantial private investment as well. I, therefore, urge my colleagues to support the retention of funding for this program at least at the level approved by the subcommittee—$81.8 million—a level already reduced by some $62 million under the amount recommended by the House, and nearly $70 million under the fiscal year 1985 appropriation.

Mr. President, I thank Senator HATFIELD, the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, and Senator JOHNSTON for their fairness and assistance in restoring a substantial amount of funding for the Appalachian Regional Development Programs. I look forward to working with them further on this and other programs in the bill when the House and Senate conferees meet this September.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, third reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the en-grossment of the amendments and third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read a third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, shall it pass?

So the bill (H.R. 2959) as amended, was passed.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and request a conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes thereon and that the Chair be authorized to appoint conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer [Mr. BOSCHWITZ] appointed Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. MCCLURE, Mr. GARN, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. MATTINGLY, Mr. DOMENICI, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. BYRD, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. SASSER, and Mr. DECONCINI conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, is it possible for the floor manager, or whoever is in control of the floor at the moment, to give us some idea what is going on? Are we just waiting for the budget or for other legislation as well?

Mr. HATFIELD. I am sorry, would the Senator repeat the question?

Mr. METZENBAUM. The question is, Are we only waiting for the budget or are we waiting and intending to pass other legislation during that interim period, if the chairman of the Appropriations Committee knows? He may not.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I defer to the distinguished assistant majority leader, the Senator from Wyoming, to give an indication of what the schedule is at this time. We have completed, of course, the appropriation bills, the conference report, and now this bill. There are no other appropriation bills that are ready to be taken up on the floor. That is all I could report at this time from my perspective.

I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. METZENBAUM. Is the Senator in a position to give us some idea what the schedule is?

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I would first thank Senator HATFIELD and Senator JOHNSTON for their remarkable work on this measure. I deeply appreciate the assistance of the Senator from Louisiana on a serious matter with regard to the issue of the NRC. Certainly none of us wish to abrogate the Sunshine Act but, nevertheless the NRC is not functioning, in my opinion. It will function better if we are able to assure that those five members of that collegial body are able to "college." And they do not now do that. Hopefully, we can deal with that later and I know Senator CHILES and Senator JOHNSTON can work toward that.

Mr. President, in response to the request of the Senator from Ohio, it is the intent of the majority leader—and I believe he is coming to the floor—that we will select something at this point to proceed with and then try to deal with the budget resoluton.

Mr. KENNEDY. Will the Senator from Ohio yield for an inquiry?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KENNEDY. I understand the Anti-Apartheid Act has passed the House of Representatives by a 274 to 50 vote. The papers are at the desk at the present time. There is every indication that the kind of overwhelming, bipartisan support that was reflected in the House of Representatives would be reflected here in the Senate.

I am just wondering, since we do have some time now and since it is a privileged matter, whether the leadership would give consideration to calling that matter up so that we might be able to debate that conference report.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, having just come into the Chamber and now being at least more up to date, let me express that the House is dealing with the budget resolution and it is hoped that they will do that and then that measure will come here. In the interim, it would be perfectly appropriate to the leadership to proceed with the anti-apartheid conference report. But I would request the Senator's indulgence so that the minute the budget resolution is here before us, that we may cease discussion of that measure and go immediately to the budget resolution for disposition here in the Senate.

Mr. KENNEDY. Well, as the leader knows, the time has been set for the budget debate in the House for 8 o'clock this evening for a 5-hour rule. It is 6:30 now. I know that the leadership will want to consult with the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee on this issue. I just happened to be on the floor at this time, and I certainly hope that we can address that issue and perhaps dispose of it prior to the time we have final action over in the House on the budget.

Since there has been such overwhelming support in the conference, and in the House of Representatives, and since the conference report represents what I consider to be a very real compromise between the House and the Senate proposal, and actually I think adopted the better aspect of each of the different proposals, I would hope that the assistant majority leader would urge the majority leader, as well as the chairman of the committee, to bring this matter to the floor at this time so that we might go about this business.

I see the majority leader on the floor and I address those questions to him.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, let me yield to the majority leader, who is now here on the floor. But I would emphasize that the House time limit is not of the duration of 5 hours. It would be much less than that, perhaps 1 hour or less.

I yield to Senator DOLE.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I have indicated a number of times today that we had hoped to take up the conference report on South Africa. I still have that intention. I would be willing to ever take it up in the next few moments if we could agree that when the budget conference arrived it would be set aside. I am advised—as I have also said a couple of times today—by Members on this side that they intend to discuss the South Africa conference report, H.R. 1460 at length. I have indicated to them if that is the case, and there is no way we can get it down today, tonight, or tomorrow, then I would file a cloture motion and that would be the first thing we would vote on when we come back.

Mr. KENNEDY. I appreciate the willingness of the majority leader to see that this matter be laid before the Senate. It might be that we could lay it before the Senate and perhaps either have one or two test votes to get a very clear indication about what the sentiment is in this body, and the various procedures by which that might be done.

Since the House vote was so overwhelming, bipartisan in nature, and since this conference report represents what I previously mentioned as the very best of both bills, I hope we might be able to address it at this time. It is a matter of enormous importance and urgency. I know there is a full program and schedule, but given the fact this is a privileged matter, I would hope we might be able to at least begin the debate and discussion on it at this time.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me make it clear I supported the bill, I support the conference report and I am prepared to file cloture. I am prepared to enter into some agreement right now. I believe we will have the budget conference report here within an hour and 15 minutes. Maybe I can visit with the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts privately.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAMM). Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE 10TH ANNIVERSARY OF HELSINKI ACCORDS

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I rise today on this 10th anniversary of the signing of the Helsinki accords to speak out once again on behalf of Soviet Jews and Christians.

The accords were originally set forth to promote improvement in human rights and religious freedoms, to increase the number of cultural and educational exchanges between the East and the West, and to foster cooperation in economics, science, and technology. Negotiations surrounding the Helsinki accords resulted in an international standard by which participating states can be held accountable. Unfortunately, there is very little to point to in terms of real changes in East-West relations resulting from the Helsinki accords. In fact, in some areas, such as human rights and emigration, there has actually been a step backward since the signing of the accords.

What this means, Mr. Chairman, is that as our societies grow and become more advanced in technology, simple human rights are being denied; in fact, they are being repudiated.

Many of my colleagues in the Senate know of and have participated in the congressional call to conscience for Soviet Jews and Christians. This program is a continuing vigil by Congress for the Soviet Jews and Christians who are held hostage by the Soviet Union. In the face of miserable emigration figures for 1985, we in Congress raise our voices every day to let the world know that we have not forgotten the oppressed peoples of the Soviet Union.

Although the Soviets signed Helsinki 10 years ago on this day, their ruthless state-sponsored persecution continues at an alarming rate. They have desecrated the agreement they once swore to uphold. What does this mean to those of us who are living in freedom?

The momentum of the upcoming summit conference fosters an ideal atmosphere for positive action. The spirit of cooperation cannot proceed without accounting for the predicament of the Soviet Jews and Christians. We must ask that future détente be contingent upon improvement of human rights in the U.S.S.R.

Mr. President, Helsinki has been defiled. I hope that as we enter this season of cooperation and dicussion, we will remember the Jews and Christians of the Soviet Union, and continue to fight for their rights.

RESPONSE TO JAPANESE TRADE PRACTICES

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, today I rise to speak on the issue of our country's growing trade deficits and I speak in support of the legislation pending in the Senate that specifically addresses our trade deficit with Japan.

Mr. President, I am just a single Senator. Perhaps my remarks and my comments will be judged as that by those who read this speech. However, I point out that I have long been an advocate of free trade and I have never made a speech of this type before. I have listened often and attentively to the arguments of my friend, Representative BILL FRENZEL, who is an ardent supporter of free trade. Yet I must rise in support of legislation that perhaps will be construed as a limitation of that principle.

I believe my record has been most consistently in support of the principles of free trade. But, at this time of record trade deficits, I shall vote for legislation that no doubt may will say will be a vote against free trade.

Indeed, the President's principal trade negotiator, U.S. Trade Representative Clayton Yeutter, strongly opposes the legislation because it "ties the President's hands in responding to unfair Japanese trading practices." In addition, Mr. Yeutter has stated that:

> Our disastrous experience during the 1930's, after passage of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act of 1930, shows that protectionist legislation is not the answer to trade problems.

I agree with that, Mr. President. Nevertheless, I support the legislation because I think unusual and extraordinary circumstances now exist that are not in conflict with free trade but, indeed, are in conflict with fair trade.

Mr. President, I have great respect for Mr. Yeutter, and I do not make this decision lightly. I actively supported Mr. Yeutter when he sought the position of our trade negotiator. I continue to do so. But I also have great respect for Senator DANFORTH, chairman of the Subcommittee on International Trade, and I agree with him that the ideal role of Congress in trade policy is to set general policy only by passing rather broad legislation.

I do not believe that Congress is particularly effective at implementing legislation or managing the day-to-day tactics of international trade, or international politics, for that matter.

But, Mr. President, we do not live in an ideal world. In an ideal world, Japan's markets would be as open to U.S. products as U.S. markets are open to Japanese products. Two factors are compelling in understanding the realities of our trade relations with Japan.

The first factor is the growing imbalance of trade between Japan and the United States. Between 1979 and 1983, U.S. exports to Japan increased from $8.2 billion to $11.6 billion. That is about a 40-percent increase. During that same period, however, Japan's exports to the United States increased from $25.7 billion to $42 billion. That increase alone—$16.3 billion—is nearly 1½ times the total $11.6 billion of U.S. exports to Japan in 1983. And, the imbalance is increasing. In 1984, our trade deficit with Japan was about $36 billion. It is expected to reach an incredible $50 billion this year.

Now, I do not believe that trade deficits, standing alone, are inherently dangerous or always bad. Imports give consumers and businesses a choice and encourage competition, if—and this is a crucial point—the exporting country's trade policies are fair. That point—whether Japan has fair trade policies—must be addressed in the context of the second factor, our history of negotiations with the Japanese.

In the past years, our trade negotiators have obtained about seven packages in which the Japanese have pledged to open Japan's markets to U.S. exports. Still, our trade deficit grows and barriers to U.S. exports continue to exist. Earlier this week, the Japanese announced another "action program" to reduce its trade barriers. So far, it has been received with skepticism, and for good reason. Previous packages have sounded good, but produced few tangible results.

There is more to obtaining access to Japan's markets than reducing specific barriers. The key to market access is the overall policy and attitude of the Japanese. And, history shows that the outlook is not that good.

Earlier this year, articles in the Asian Wall Street Journal Weekly and the Asahi Evening News, the largest English language paper in Japan, were brought to my attention. I ask unanimous consent that the articles be printed in the RECORD and recommend them to my colleagues for reading.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JAPAN SHRUGS OFF TOUGH TRADE TALK FROM THE U.S.

(By E.S. Browning)

TOKYO.—It is a ritual as predictable as the arrival of the cherry blossoms, which are just appearing here. Every spring, the U.S. damands trade concessions from Japan. Every spring, Japan grovels and concedes. And every spring the U.S. trade deficit with Japan goes on growing.

This year, U.S. congiressmen say they finnally are getting tough, and will force Japan to truly open its markets to U.S. goods.

The Senate Finance Committee last week approved legislation that would require President Reagan to take steps within 90 days to offset the increase to the U.S. trade deficit expected to result from Japan's decision to expand the number of autos it exports to the U.S. to 2.3 million a year, from 1.85 million in the year ended March 31.

That bill followed on the heels of similar non-binding resolutions passed by the two houses of Congress calling on Mr. Reagan to restrict imports of Japanese goods if he can't persuade Japan to increase its purchases of U.S. products.

In Tokyo, a senior Japanese official holds his head in his hands, cowering in mock horror. "We are so afraid," he says. Turning serious, he adds, "This is nonsense, you know. How can we take it seriously?"

Many Japanese officials do take the threat seriously, of course. But they tend to see it as yet another inconsistent, unpredictable American attack. They say privately that change here requires long, steady pressure and patience, and that American outrage usually fades as quickly as it rises. Since Congress insists on seeing results within 60 to 90 days, the Japanese, from Prime Minister Yasuhiro Nakasone on down, are offering promises. They assure the U.S. among other things, that the Japanese telecommunications market now is "fully" liberalized.

EMOTIONAL PROBLEM

Japanese cynics are hoping that the American outcry will go away soon so they can get back to real work. More thoughtful Japanese worry that the problem could be getting serious—not only in economic terms.

"I am seriously concerned that there is too much emotion and impatience in Congress, without due understanding of the situation," say a former foreign minister, Saburo Okita, who is Mr. Nakasone's chief adviser on trade.

"There is the concern (here) that if we are pressed too much by a foreign government, it may arouse nationalistic sentiment," says Mr. Okita, one of the most internationally minded of Japanese officials. "This would really damage Japan. At the same time . . . if you have a nationalistic, unfriendly Japan in this part of Asia, the whole U.S. policy would be upset."

On a less exalted plane, a deficit like last year's $37 billion U.S. imbalance in trade with Japan (likely to exceed $40 billion this year) poses some purely practical problems. Even if Japan's government suddenly ordered an end to the deficit—something even Japan Inc., can't do—it is hard to see how the imbalance could be ended. Even fanciful solutions fall short. Consider:

All Japanese could be required to eat USDA beef. Japan produces around $2.5 billion worth of beef each year—much of it expensive, marbled beef from hand-massaged, beer-fed cattle. If Japan replaced that with U.S. prime, and continued paying Japanese beef prices, it would be a big new market. But the Japanese would have to increase consumption sixfold in order to bring the deficit back even to the already-whopping 1983 level of $19 billion. It would help only a little if the Japanese ate, with their steak sandwiches, only U.S. oranges, which also currently are limited by quota. That would knock $1.5 billion more of the deficit.

Japan could buy only American telephones and switching systems, another business whose rapid growth had caused tensions with the U.S. That would have knocked another $2.3 billion being off the 1984 deficit, $2.3 billion being the total of Japan's 1983 production for export and domestic use.

The U.S. could require that Japan buy only American military hardware (about 90% of Japan's needs currently are made in Japan, often under license from the U.S.). That would be a boon to beleaguered defense contractors, but it would reduce the deficit by just $2.8 billion (90% of Japan's 1984 hardware spending).

JUNK AUTOS

With Japan eating only U.S. beef and oranges, buying only U.S. telephones and firing only U.S. rifles, the trade deficit still would have stood at $28 billion last year. For the U.S. to eliminate the deficit entirely, it would have to require that Japan also junk its entire auto industry. The U.S. auto industry then could pick up $16.8 billion in Japanese sales, and Japan would lose around $15.4 billion in U.S. sales, finally wiping out the deficit.

Small wonder that U.S. officials don't even hope to put the U.S. trade balance back in the Black.

"Take away all barriers to the Japanese market, push the yen to a sharply higher level against the U.S. dollar, and I believe the U.S. would still run a trade deficit with Japan, perhaps on the order of $15 billion," the undersecretary of commerce for international trade, Lionel Olmer, said in a recent speech.

If Japan accepts all of the current demands, Washington officials say, the best they could hope for would be a $10 billion increase in U.S. exports, which would be offset partly by growing Japanese exports. Most Japanese and U.S. officials consider even the $10 billion figure well beyond reach.

So what can be done? The answers, according to U.S. and Japanese businessmen here, are old and they aren't exciting.

Instead of demanding that Japan become more like the U.S., American businessmen must learn to operate in the Japanese market. They must join Japanese business associations, and they must be prepared to make mistakes and lose money at first, as Japanese companies like Toyota Motor Corp. and NEC Corp. did in the U.S.

They must adjust their products to Japan. American made goods are getting the same bad reputation in Japan that Japanese goods once had in the U.S. Japanese officials delight in telling stories about U.S. products that won't hold up in Japanese humidity, or that burn out because of the difference between U.S. and Japanese electric power voltage.

The U.S. government must take a more consistent approach. U.S. officials are proud of their recent four-pronged effort to open Japanese markets—in telecommunications, wood products, electronics and medical supplies. But the Japanese snicker privately about it. The U.S. has a particularly strong grievance in medical equipment, for example; Japan has been dragging its feet for nearly two years about changing testing requirements that restrict the sale of foreign-made equipment. But it took the U.S. weeks to name someone to head the medical negotiating team, and to tell the Japanese specifically what the U.S. wanted.

U.S. HABITATS

Economists add that the U.S. needs to reduce its government budget deficit and the dollar's value, which inflates the price of U.S. goods. They also talk about U.S. labor costs and executive salaries, both higher than in Japan, and about the strong American tendency to borrow and consume, while the Japanese tend to save nearly 20% of income.

To many experts, it seems a too-tall order.

"We realize we must import, particularly from the U.S., in view of the severe trade imbalance," says Mr. Okita. Mr. Nakasone's trade adviser. But he and others say they doubt that Japan will buy as much as Americans hope. "We recognize that the U.S. has very real abilities in high technology. But when it comes to ordinary equipment, the equipment isn't quite up to standard," says Mr. Okita. The U.S. deficit with Japan is bound to grow further this year, he says—an assessment that many U.S. and Japanese officials share.

Given the frustrations, Japanese experts are worrying more and more that Congress will end up enacting some form of punitive legislation. If it does so, it will want to draft it carefully.

An economist at one of Japan's securities houses has been conducting simulations of what would happen if the U.S. put a surcharge on all Japanese goods. The surcharge would undoubtedly hurt Japan, by slowing its economic growth, this economist says. But he says it wouldn't reduce the U.S. trade deficit. Like the quotas on Japanese auto exports, he says, it would drive up the prices of Japanese goods, offsetting the drop in volume.

AUTO EXPORTS TO U.S.

U.S. President Ronald Reagan announced last Friday that he did not intend to seek the extension of Japan's voluntary automobile export restriction, due to expire at the end of March. The Japanese parties concerned, however, are already taking steps in the direction of virtually extending the restriction. This does not stand to reason.

Reagan stated in the announcement that he believed in the wisdom of upholding the principle of free and fair trade for consumers of the world. His objective seems to be to go back to the spirit of the General Agreement on Tariff and Trade (GATT) and the Antitrust Law by discontinuing what was, for all intents and purposes, an export cartel that existed for four years.

The export restriction on Japanese automobiles that began in 1981 (the quota was 1.85 million units for 1984) led to an absence of competition in the U.S. market, and raised the prices not only of Japanese cars but also American cars. But now that American makers have rang up record profits, the export restriction is being severely criticized by American consumers.

Reagan had to decide between heeding the voice of general consumers or giving in to the protectionist pressure in Congress and the auto industry, including the unions. He opted for the former. His choice is quite understandable, considering that his present interest, now that he is serving his second term, is to make sure that his name will go down in history.

The Japanese Ministry of International Trade and Industry (MITI), however, fearing a potential large increase of exports after the lifting of the quota, is considering some sort of export restriction measure. The most likely measure, in light of the nature of the U.S. Antitrust Law, is the export trade control measure which MITI has so far practiced—that is, to allot the production quotas individually to makers. The Japanese auto industry has more or less accepted MITI's approach, and the main concern of automakers here is now said to be their shares under the new arrangement.

The voluntary export restriction that came into force in 1981 was at the urging of the United States, whose automobile industry was in a dire recession. At the time, the U.S. attorney general announced that the action did not violate the Antitrust Law, and the American public accepted it as a contingency measure.

Over the next four years, the U.S. economy recovered, and the situation changed altogether. The people are now emphasizing "consumers' interests" more than "bringing salvation to the jobless." Actually, everyone seems to be talking of how much consumers lost as a result of the import control on foreign cars.

Should Japan decide to continue curbing its auto exports to the United States in these circumstances, the U.S. auto industry may be elated, but general consumers will be bitterly disappointed. And since the U.S. government has not asked Japan to take such a measure, it will certainly not do anything about it. Furthermore, Japan cannot expect immunity from the Antitrust Law this time. In fact, there is every possibility that American consumer groups may file an action with the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) on the grounds of infringement of the Antitrust Law. As a matter of fact, the Japanese home electrical appliance industry currently has a case of suspected export cartel pending in the U.S. Supreme Court.

MITI is afraid of the possibility that the ongoing trade disputes between Japan and the United States may escalate as a result of a sudden increase in Japanese auto exports to the United States following the abolition of the export restriction. We certainly do not rule out that possibility. However, future Japanese export cars are bound to include those which even the staunchest of trade protectionists in America will not be able to complain about—specifically, those which are ordered by American carmakers from Japanese makers for sale under American brand names. Such cars should number quite many.

Furthermore, the U.S. Department of Commerce report, which Reagan referred to in deciding against imposing further import quotas, stated that while Japanese cars in the U.S. market will have increased by 1.1 million units three years after the lifting of the import control, this should not pose any threat to the U.S. auto industry.

In correcting the Japan-U.S. trade imbalance, the root of the matter is to balance the extremely lopsided dollar-yen exchange rate. Of course it is also necessary to continue making item-wise and sector-wise adjustments where problems exist. Still, any measure to be taken must be in keeping with the spirit of the Antitrust Law and the underlying principles of GATT.

Reagan's statement last Friday also touched on the ongoing Japan-U.S. trade talks which are nearing their final stages. The U.S. president urged Japan to "respond in a reciprocal manner." But surely, the United States has merely "paid back" its four-year "debt" to Japan, and is in no position to press Japan to reciprocate.

The Japanese side must not play into America's tough bargaining hands. Japan must play cool and follow through the principle of free trade. (March 5)

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, these articles provide some insights into the issue. When the President did not request an extension of the voluntary restraint agreement on automobile imports, he urged the Japanese to reciprocate and increase access to Japan's markets. Rather than praise the President for ending the restraint agreement and allow unlimited access, the Asahi Evening News editorialized that we owe the Japanese something. Referring to the President's action of ending the quota, the newspaper stated:

But surely, the United States has merely "paid back" its four-year "debt" to Japan, and is in no position to press Japan to reciprocate. The Japanese side must not play into America's tough bargaining hands. Japan must play cool and follow through the principles of free trade.

I certainly hope that we have tough bargaining hands.

As I indicated earlier, I am not convinced that our "tough bargaining" has yielded tangible results. I am not convinced that Japan plays fairly by the rules of open trading relationships or that the credibility of our negotiators is so greatly respected or feared by the Japanese.

Only 1 month after the above editorial appeared, the headlines of the Asian Wall Street Journal read "Japan Shrugs Off Tough Trade Talk from the U.S." as a "rite of spring." The article quoted a senior Japanese official as saying, "This is nonsense you know. How can we take it seriously?" The article goes on to contend that our protests against lifting the auto restraints are simply "another inconsistent, unpredictable American attack" and asserts that change "requires long, steady pressure and patience, and American outrage fades as quickly as it rises."

Mr. President, it is America's patience that is fading and our outrage is more consistent and predictable. This legislation is a clear indication that we are serious. The legislation is not a free trader's dream. But I do not believe it is a protectionist measure like that of the 1930's. Our trade laws empower the President to negotiate the removal of unfair trade policies or retaliate against the offending countries. This legislation requires the President to enforce those trade laws. It may not be the ideal role for the Congress to play in trade policy. But, it reflects reality. The Congress is serious about obtaining true access to the markets in Japan and our other trading partners. I believe that Congress has the right to expect the aggressive, effective enforcement of our trade laws. That can strengthen and reinforce the credibility of our negotiators and help prevent precipitous protectionist actions by the Congress.

Mr. President, I believe that now is the time to act. I am disappointed that the legislation will not be considered this week. But I pledge my support when it is considered later in this Congress.

I thank the Chair.

ANTI-APARTHEID ACTION ACT OF 1987

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I have been asked by a number of Senators about plans for the conference report on H.R. 1460. I think there are some who have indicated that if it were not laid down until everything else was finished this evening, they would like to debate it and have a vote at that time in some way to indicate support or lack of support for the conference report. I have suggested that rather than do that, we take from now until quarter of 8 to debate the conference report on H.R. 1460, at which time I understand the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Connecticut would move to table the conference report, which they would oppose, and following that vote it would be set aside so that we might go on to the budget conference report, which should be arriving about that time.

Mr. KENNEDY. If it is not possible to complete action prior to the time of the vote, is it the intention of the majority leader to file a cloture motion?

Mr. DOLE. that is correct. I indicated that earlier. I have been advised by Members who feel very strongly on the other side that they are prepared to discuss this at length, which would be tonight and tomorrow. Under those conditions, it seems to me the best course of action to pursue is to have it before the senate when we come back with a cloture motion filed. That motion would not mature unless we come in tomorrow, as I understand it, so I would need consent that we could have the cloture vote when we return on September 9, on a Monday.

Mr. KENNEDY. Parliamentary inquiry. Will the Chair repeat the unanimous-consent request for the benefit of the Senator from Massachusetts?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The distinguished majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. That we debate the conference report on H.R. 1460 until 7:45 p.m., at which time the Senators from Massachusetts and Connecticut would offer a motion to table the conference report, which I understand they would oppose, and following the conclusion of that vote, the conference report on H.R. 1460 be set aside.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I will not—am I correct in my understanding that at some time after the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee calls up the conference report, the majority leader will file a cloture motion and that he will work out, if not by consent agreement, a designated time for a cloture vote? I am obviously concerned that if we have that vote on Monday after we return, the votes will be there, but I would hope that every Senator would be alerted as to the possibility of a vote at that time.

Mr. DOLE. That is correct. I would indicate that I have determined, since we have accomplished so much in the past few days with the cooperation of every Member, that we would be better served by coming on the ninth but having votes on the ninth, and this is one vote that will be scheduled on that date.

ANTI-APARTHEID ACTION ACT OF 1985—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on H.R. 1460 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be stated.

The Legislative Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 1460) to express the opposition of the United States to the system of apartheid in South Africa, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses this report, signed by a majority of the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

(The conference report is printed in the House proceedings of the RECORD of today, August 1, 1985.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I rise to ask Members to vote favorably for this conference report.

The conferees from the Senate and the House met for approximately 4½ hours yesterday. We discussed the nature of our conference, which came about because the House of Representatives had decided that they wished to have a conference as opposed to conducting a vote on the original Senate bill that was passed on this floor 80 to 12.

I make this point, Mr. President, because on numerous occasions, I mentioned to colleagues in the House that if they were to approach this subject and have a bill, certainly there was an option that was clearly available to do that, and my colleagues in the House carefully considered that option and demanded a conference, which we held.

Now, during the course of the conference, we faced early on the fact that there were different points of view as to how the South African question should be approached. In truth, both of the bills, the Senate and the House, were restrained measures in most respects. The Senate bill, as you will recall, Mr. President, from our debate on this floor, was aimed at incentives for American business to enter into South Africa more vigorously, to have opportunities for service with American citizens, black and white citizens of South Africa; that that country might prosper under the right conditions, the Sullivan Principles, and that there might be more opportunities for a hands-on experience of Americans in that troubled country.

During the course of committee consideration—and this was confirmed on the Senate floor—there were three sanctions: No more bank loans to the South African Government, no nuclear cooperation with that government, and no computer sales to elements of that government that are enforcing apartheid. By any standard, most Americans felt these were relatively mild sanctions. Indeed, in the debate it was pointed out that very few bank loans are being made to the South African Government, and the American Banking Association has recommended that none be made.

Now, we see in the papers today, coincident with this debate, that a major bank in this country has decided not to make anymore loans to anybody in that country. That was not our course, Mr. President. We encouraged active American involvement, and we went the route of incentives, not a punitive route.

Now, the House bill basically went that same route but had two additional features: First, a banning of new investments in South Africa. This was circumscribed to say that if you were making money in South Africa, you could reinvest it in South African markets, but essentially it stopped new investments. That ran counter to the entire philosophy of our bill.

I indicated to conferees that we would find that unacceptable because, philosophically, it was totally out of kilter with our thrust.

The second major issue was the banning of the further import of Krugerrands into this country. On that issue, I indicated that we would have to negotiate if there was to be a conference, and indeed we did. Ultimately, the outcome of the conference—and the only significant change in the Senate bill—was that Krugerrands could no longer be imported into the United States of America unless, and I think this is important, Mr. President, the South African Government meets only one of eight conditions which shows even a partial movement toward the ending of apartheid.

I point out that those eight conditions are clearly specified in our bill. In my judgment, they are really, without debate, in human terms.

For example, if the Government of South Africa frees political prisoners, that is enough for the President to lift the ban on Krugerrands if persons are interested in buying those coins in our country.

I point out that prior to our debate yesterday, the sale of Krugerrands in America had plummeted to a point that the Canadian Maple Leaf is by far the predominant coin.

To add one more thing, our Senate bill, which we passed with a vote of 80 to 12, provided for the minting of an American gold coin; and in a bipartisan spirit yesterday, we said it would have denomination, legal tender status. There would be a $50 coin, a $20 coin, a $10 coin, and a $5 coin, as I recall, that Americans could buy. They could vote with their dollars for gold in an American mint. I think that is important.

Mr. President, if I speak with some emotion about this subject, so be it, because it is time we spoke, it is time we acted. This is the time to do so.

I appreciate that some would say that there is no urgency, that there are all sorts of difficulties. Someone even suggested in conference that movement on our part would somehow assist the Soviet Union, that there would be battleships of the Soviet Union in South African ports within weeks. The extravagance of language with regard to this bill is astonishing, and it is wrong.

Mr. President, the time to act is now. I appreciate the calm words of the majority leader, in which he suggests that there are Senators prepared to talk on and on, and that is their privilege. It takes no skill to postpone action, if you want to do so at this point in the session. All of us have tried to do that on some occasion, and many of us have done it with some success.

I make these points because even on the very specific point on which the Senator yielded, there are at least eight remedies by which the President can lift the whole situation if that is required.

I point out that we are in a situation with this bill in which we are still encouraging active American involvement in South Africa. We still have a set of mild sanctions which indicate our seriousness of intent.

Mr. President, this is bill designed to help an ailing country, and I think that is important. It is also a bill that speaks a great deal about our compassion for blacks in South Africa and says it loud and clear. As Representative PARREN MITCHELL said in our conference yesterday, we need a clear signal, and he spoke movingly about that fact that blacks in South Africa see the Krugerrand issue as that kind of clear signal—unambiguous, immediate, and clear.

I suppose if the issue did not have such gravity, it would not be of great moment, but this one is serious. This is our opportunity in Congress to act. I pray that if we are not able to do so, the President of the United States and the Secretary of State will move to shape our policy, to move beyond constructive engagement to things they should be doing as they wrestle with these grave problems.

All of us will attempt to help in that respect. But this was our opportunity to speak in a bipartisan way, loud and clear. The House has done so by a vote of 380 to 48.

The Republicans in the House voted 3 to 1 for this conference report. The vote on the conference report, I point out, was a great deal stronger than on the original House bill, and for good reason. The people on our side of the aisle in the House said this is a bill that preserves the right to invest, to get in there, to help. They like that idea. I like that idea. That was the major push we had, in addition to pointing out, in a compassionate but compelling way, that we must act, that we must send clear signals to blacks who have been oppressed by the apartheid system.

Mr. President, I shall not speak much longer. We have before us, I think, an excellent piece of legislation, one that I am certain in due course will command a large majority of this body.

We do not know what will occur in 5 or 6 weeks. There may be other times and other occasions to treat the issue in different ways. But, for the moment, this seems to be a product that comes from persons on both sides of the aisle who have wisdom and a heart for persons who need our help and a very high regard for a nation that clearly needs the help of the international community, if it is to pull itself out of the spiral of despair in which South Africa is currently headed. We have that opportunity, and I hope the conference report will have strong support in this body.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I will not deny the Senator from Massachusetts a chance to speak. We can proceed only until 7:45.

Mr. President, there is room for a most reasonable and strenuous disagreement with the statement of the Senator from Indiana, the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, that this is an excellent piece of legislation. I have no truck for apartheid—indeed it is evil and I deplore it. But this action will not end it, and more than likely this action will prolong it.

There is a great deal of doubt in this Senator's mind that this will help a nation in trouble, as was suggested by him. Who is going to stop this ball from rolling down the hill when the violence it fosters erupts even greater?

It is no coincidence that the violence in South Africa escalated after the House and the Senate separately acted.

If you take a look at the resolution itself, one of the things in there is a typical piece of our racist pandering and meandering, in trying to accomplish what looks good to the public.

If anybody here can demonstrate to me how this piece of legislation is going to improve the lot of those black Africans who we say we want to help, I have yet to hear the argument. Our moral suasion is not increased by our statement that puts comparative worth on evils in this world.

Look at the sixth requirement, which is entering into meaningful negotiations with truly representative black leaders. Who, in heaven's name, is going to define who those are? Who in this room is going to say that somebody can say that one of them is not truly representative? So one of the requirements, on its face, is impossible to meet.

Who is to pick them? Representative SOLARZ, or the Senator from Massachusetts, or the Senator from Wyoming? Who is going to pick the truly representative black leaders?

Who in this room is going to say that it perhaps should be those who are elected by the blacks? There are those people in South Africa who are elected black officials, elected by blacks. Would they be? No; they would not be acceptable to these people who offer us this.

I warn the Senate that once that ball starts down the hill, nobody is going to stop it.

And I ask us to look back at those countries we have sought to help with sanctions and other maneuvers from the floor of this Senate, to tell me that the Iranians are better off under Khomeini than they were under the Shah or that the Nicaraguans are better off under the Communist grip than they were under Somoza, or that the Cambodians are better off in our abandonment of responsibility over there. These balls gain the momentum that nothing we do on this floor can cease and, when the violence erupts and erupts and erupts again, when is it that we in this body, since we chose to govern South Africa, are going to say enough? And you know and I know that the answer to that is perfectly never.

There are many ways that we can do this to help the situation. One of the curious things about South Africa is that the business establishment perhaps is the only example in the world where it sits to the left of the government in power, where the business community is the one that has been bringing changes. But this action would harm the business community, the most reform-oriented sector of South African Society.

I have heard endless numbers of Senators on this floor time and time again express outrage at the concept of sanctions as they operate in the diplomatic world but particularly as they operate in the Soviet Union.

This country, says the Senator from Indiana, is in need of help, and perhaps that is true, but ought we not to consider what help amounts to?

Is it we who are helping ourselves and our reputations in front of our own constituents? Or is it we who are actually seeking to help South Africans?

Chief Butalesi, even Bishop Tutu, has said that sanctions are not the way to go. When it comes down to choosing truly representative black leaders, are we going to suggest that they are not because they disagree with what takes place on the floor of the Senate of the United States?

Probably.

Mr. President, when I introduced my amendment to this resolution 2 weeks ago, to my partial delight and my outright dismay, a number of Senators came afterwards and told me that they really believe in it and if I would introduce it as a piece of freestanding legislation or a freestanding resolution, they would vote for it.

It is nice to be recognized for having pricked the conscience of the Senate, but it was pricked. Why not do it when we had the opportunity? Why is it more moral to do it as a piece of freestand legislation or resolution than it is attached to the very thing which I asked us to be consistent over? Why? Because politics got in the way.

Mr. President, I believe that this conference report is not excellent as the chairman has suggested. If we adopt it, we would be retracing the tragic steps of previous American Congresses and administrations that have helped to topple bad regimes and install ones that are immeasurably worse. The people of Vietnam, Cambodia, Laos, Iran, Nicaragua, Zimbabwe, to mention only a few, have the U.S. Government to thank for pushing them out of the frying pan and right into the fire. Now we seem bent on going through this dreary exercise again. Now the people of South Africa are to be "helped" in the words of the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, out of a regime we find unsatisfactory—but helped into what?

Who is this body or in the White House will stand up and guarantee that if sanctions make the lives of ordinary South Africans poorer and less free, he will willingly stand up and admit it? Do the supporters of sanctions even conceive of a possible scenario in which sanctions will make for better lives for South Africans?

What happens when Soviet-directed forces, emboldened by the sanctions, cause huge disruptions? What would our long-distance Governors of South Africa have the government do? Should it repress these disruptions? Should it give in to the demands of the Soviet-directed African National Congress? What will the Congress do to try to fine-tune the situation down there? We all know what the Congress will do: Handwringing and defensive posturing, just like in the cases of Vietnam, Iran, Cambodia and on and on. When will this body begin to feel shame for the peoples it has helped to push under worse tyrannies?

Posturing with regard to South Africa, however, is all the more dishonorable because it is driven by racial politics in this country. I am dismayed by how many elected officials know that it is wrong to try to destabilize the South African regime, but rush to do so because they think they will curry favor with black American votes for doing so. What an insult to black American voter. Of course, black American voters don't like apartheid—but how insulting to suppose that they find the bloody, cannibalistic tyrannies of black Africa more to their liking. How shameful it is for white middle-class Members of Congress to try to foster racism in black voters.

Let us not indulge in the nonsense we heard on the floor last week about these sanctions "helping" South Africa. If any Member believes they are a help, he ought to apply such helpful measures to his own State! No. The question before us is whether we ought to put the United States on the side of those who are trying to overthrow the Government of South Africa, and bring about a situation immeasurably worse for blacks and whites alike than the one which exists now.

Mr. President, before we voted last time, I tried to amend the South Africa resolution, to at least make this Government's actions with regard to unsavory regimes morally consistent. Why, I ask, do we declare economic war on South Africa, and not on regimes that are much, much worse? It is not morality, but the opposite thereof, to fight lesser evils while siding with greater evils. Although the amendment lost, a majority of Members have told me privately that they agreed with me, and that they would vote for my approach to this problem were it to be offered as free-standing legislation.

I intend to do that and seek a vote because we owe no less to our morality.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a series of articles and editorials from various newspapers around the world and from this country.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Times, July 29, 1985]

IN S. AFRICA, SOVIETS TURN INVISIBLE SCREWS

(By Arnaud de Borchgrave)

The "winds of change" that drove the colonial powers—Belgium, France, Britain and Portugal—from the African continent brought great hopes for democracy and economic development. More than a quarter century has passed since the wave of independence began. The shining hope has been supplanted by dictatorship, repression, brutality, venality, starvation and despair now commonplace throughout the continent. The exception has been South Africa, long an enclave of prosperity and order.

Over the years, most recently in conversations with President Pieter W. Botha, I learned of the constructive changes and steady progress taking place in South Africa that would lead to the dismantling of the abhorrent apartheid system not by violent revolution and race war, but by a reasoned process. Mr. Botha spoke to me of the tremendous political risks he was taking to bring about constitutional and other internal reforms. He said, "We can see all of black Africa slowly dying, and we have no intention of abandoning our country to the same fate."

What South Africans once found unmanaginable may now become a reality.

How curious it is to find the United States government expressing its "revulsion" at the South African state of emergency declared by the Pretoria government to put down a wave of terrorism in which an estimated 450 black South Africans have been the victims of systematic atrocities perpetrated by revolutionaries who also happen to be black. Would our State Department officials rather that South Africa decide that the lives and property of black people should not enjoy the protection of the law?

Ironically, the wave of violence washing over South Africa's urban black townships, bringing death to scores of black people at the hands of the revolutionary terrorists of the African National Congress, was generated in large part by the Nkomati accord, signed on March 16 last year between Mozambique and South Africa.

The crucial provision of Nkomati required Samora Machel, the Marxist leader of Mozambique, to close down the bases and facilities enjoyed by the African National Congress (ANC). This revolutionary movement has long been supported by the Soviet Union and has been under the political domination of the South African Communist Party for the past four decades. Mozambique had allowed ANC to use its territory to establish camps from which terrorist teams were infiltrated into South Africa. Mr. Machel immediately fulfilled his Nkomati pledge. The ANC's terror cadre was sent packing (to Zambia, Tanzania and Angola), and key personnel in the ANC political and terrorist command structure were expelled. ANC's terrorist operations were disrupted, and South Africa maintained the pressure by raiding ANC camps harbored by other neighboring countries.

President Botha's government had high expectations that Nkomati would signal the end of ANC as a terrorist problem. Then they could divert much of their defense budget into expanding their economy, and resume the ponderous pace of the progressive integration of black, Asian and mixed-race South Africans into the country's economic and political system. This is the key point: to bring black South Africans into the POLITICAL system would be to destroy the whole system of apartheid with its restrictions on areas of residence and property ownership.

Pretoria made this assumption, however, without considering that the only option left to the ANC, other than admission of defeat, was to mobilize their supporters inside South Africa, particularly in some of the black trade unions and in the United Democratic Front (UDF) coalition. Furthermore, for non-white South Africans, a climate of rising expectations had been created that encouraged militancy and pressure tactics to accelerate the sluggish pace of change. The dropping of a number of restrictive racial laws and the first officially sanctioned cracks in political segregation have contributed to that feeling of expectation, as has the fact that wages in South Africa are well above the African norm. Wages may be low compared with those in the United States, but they are so far above the norm for Africa that tens of thousands of black voluntarily leave their black-ruled bordering countries to take jobs in South Africa in spite of the inane, degrading humiliations of apartheid regulations.

ANC's regrouping after the Nkomati reverse was speedy. Last summer the ANC leadership held lengthy consultations with leading American anti-South Africa activists at the United Nations, then immediately went to Havana to work out details on creating external diplomatic pressure against South Africa in the United States and Western Europe, in which U.N. agencies would play a supporting role. By last October, the plans were ready for implementation. The opening round in "making South Africa ungovernable" commenced with illegal strikes by black trade unions. Some of the leaders were arrested, and those arrests were the focus of protests in Europe and America in the first two weeks of November.

On Thanksgiving, the campaign of American protests and sit-ins against South Africa moved into high gear. The U.S. protest coalition, known as the Free South Africa Movement (FSAM), is spearheaded by Randall Robinson's TransAfrica, a lobbying organization. They have made clear their commitment to the ANC and to other revolutionary movements and regimes sponsored by Moscow in Africa and the Caribbean.

Since then, Mr. Robinson has given the national media a daily, carefully orchestrated "story." He has de facto "proprietary rights" over protest at the South African Embassy. Two or three prominent people are lined up in advance to get arrested, which is a perfectly convenient thing to do since the U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia has refused to prosecute anyone demonstrating at the South African Embassy, while vigorously prosecuting those who protest at the Soviet Union's Embassy. A press conference is held at which the prominent people make statements, and then a group of demonstrators selected well in advance by TransAfrica goes to the embassy, where they demonstrate and are arrested.

Having learned from the civil rights and anti-Vietnam war protests, today's demonstrators are neatly dressed, orderly, polite—and in the long run as dangerous as the ANC-inspired mobs who have killed more than 450 black South Africans since the present terrorism campaign erupted. "On camera," the protestors are concerned, as indeed, most of us are, with human rights and the abuse of power. But the FSAM agenda aims at persuading the U.S. government to help economically isolate South Africa from the Free World and thus assist in overthrowing it and replacing it with a Soviet-dominated, pseudo-"nationalist" revolutionary regime. The polite dignitaries on the picket line, knowingly or unwittingly, are acting to transform South Africa into an Ethiopia, a Uganda, an Angola, a Tanzania or a Zimbabwe—a process in which democracy has meant one man, one vote, one time! And no less a personage than Richard Lugar, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, is lending himself, albeit unwittingly, to this demolition exercise.

That is the ultimate purpose of the economic warfare campaigns to end economic relations and isolate South Africa from the United States. TransAfrica's FSAM crusaders are not fazed by the fact that such economic measures would force America to depend on the Soviet Union as the sole alternative supplier of a variety of strategic minerals we now buy freely from South Africa. After all, TransAfrica consistently promoted the nasty little pro-Soviet regime on Grenada.

Does it matter particularly whether South Africa is ruled in five years time by a government allied with the Soviet Union? The answer is yes, because ultimately our continued freedom depends on it.

South Africa is essential to the strategic survival of the United States and Western Europe. That strategic importance is the result of her geology and geography; and it is not a fact that is going to change for many years. South Africa is the sole source in the non-Communist world of a multitude of rare minerals which are critical to the industrial and military strength of the West—among them chromium, platinum and vanadium. These and other rare metals form the exotic alloys that enable rockets and jet engines to withstand intense heat, and which strengthen submarine hulls against the enormous pressures of the deep oceans, and have many specialized functions in our high technology. There is one alternative source for those minerals—the Soviet Union.

Furthermore, geography has placed South Africa astride the shipping lanes traveled by the oil tankers carrying crude oil from the Persian Gulf across the Indian Ocean and around the Cape of Good Hope into the Atlantic. The government which rules South Africa can control the tanker traffic carrying the Gulf's petroleum to Western Europe, Latin America and the United States.

The leaders of the Soviet Union obviously are aware of this. In sum, the blunt fact remains that South Africa represents the jugular vein of the West, and that even if South Africa had no controversial and unpopular racial and ethnic regulations, that country would be a target of Soviet imperialism. The Kremlin would prefer to win world power without provoking us to resist. The name of the geopolitical game is, after all, as Sun Tsu told us 25 centuries ago, to subdue the armies of one's enemies without ever having to fight them. Therefore, they use what is called in Soviet jargon "active measures" that entail propaganda, subversion, agents of influence, disinformation and other techniques implemented primarily by the KGB in cooperation with all Soviet agencies and assets to bring about the gradual collapse of our will to resist.

In the case of South Africa, as with Vietnam 15 years ago, the multifaceted Soviet "active measures" campaign aims to persuade our leaders to forget that America's strategic viability will be at risk in South Africa for many decades—regardless of the political and racial complexion of its government.

Is there proof that the Soviets are engaging in "active measures" to promote an ANC rule over South Africa? Yes, in fact the only time in history that the Soviets ever publicly admitted that such "active measures" existed came in a statement to the U.N. General Assembly four years ago. The U.S.S.R. formally stated, "Efforts are under way in the Soviet Union to mobilize world opinion in the fight to eliminate colonialism, racism and apartheid in southern Africa. Active measures in this direction are being carried out." The Soviets even named some of the agencies implementing "active measures." They were the Soviet organizations run by the International Department of the Soviet Communist Party Central Committee in cooperation with the KGB that, in turn, control the international fronts, among which are the World Peace Council (WPC), International Association of Democratic Lawyers (IADL), Women's International Democratic Federation (WIDF), and World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU).

However, most Western public officials, public opinion molders, and particularly Congress and the media are hesitant, if not unwilling, to acknowledge the fact that the Soviet Union is seeking directly and through local surrogates to detach South Africa from the West, deny the West access to its strategic minerals and, sooner or later, replace its government with a regime more to Moscow's liking. Some argue instead that "nationalists" will take over ANC and expel the Marxists; but to date ANC's Marxist have regularly purged "nationalists" who chafed under their strict discipline.

The bottom line is that it is irrelevant whether anti-American "nationalists" or anti-American Marxists seize power in South Africa. The Soviets undoubtedly would prefer to see a Marxist-Leninist regime of the Angolan, Ethiopian or Cuban model take over. For many years, Soviet policy in the Third World has been to support any movement or regime so long as it was anti-American. They recognize that an ultra-nationalist or extremist regime determinedly hostile to American interests—Khomeini's Iran being a prime example—would serve Moscow's interests nearly as well in placing control of U.S. access to strategic minerals in hostile hands.

Without South Africa's minerals, America's high-technology defense industries would have to depend on the Soviets for those rare strategic minerals. If America did not buy minerals from South Africa, what price do you think the Soviets would set?

There is also a moral irony in this. Year by year over the past decade and more, as the urban black population has increased and skilled, educated black people play an expanding role in the modern urban economy, South Africa has been dropping racially restrictive laws and now is committed to opening the political power structure. On the other hand, Soviet gold, as Alexander Solzhenitsyn told us, is the product of the Soviet forced labor camps which comprise the Gulag Archipelago. Forced labor accounts for nearly all of Soviet mining operations. How the Soviet cynics must jeer to see America and Europe urging abandonment of trade with South Africa when their only alternative must be to line up at the Soviet trade counter and, therefore, to encourage the Soviets to expand their use of forced labor.

When the Politburo first considered how South Africa might be brought into the Communist camp back in Stalin's time, they used a classic tactic; develop a well-organized Communist Party and Communist underground; then penetrate and take over the African National Congress (ANC); organize a "popular front"; use terror to dispose of political opponents, demoralize the population, bring them under control and escalate into mass confrontational protests in order to elicit a stern reaction on the part of the government and police; then use that as the "justification" for a move into terrorist "armed struggle."

But in more recent years, in the Third World, the Soviets have recognized that it is sufficient that a government merely be anti-American for Soviet interests to be served. Of course the Soviets eventually would like to see traditional Marxist-Leninist parties ruling the countries of the Third World. But they realize that revolution by stages is less likely to alarm Western governments, thus they can avoid armed confrontations. After all, is the loss of one more slice of salami worth fighting over? In this type of "cold" conflict, all the tactics short of armed confrontation—propaganda, "active measures," disinformation and deception—play a very important role in undermining America's will to act in defense of our national interest, and, in the case of South Africa, in persuading our government to isolate America from South Africa.

From secret information provided by a high-level Soviet official who has now defected to the West, it has been learned that Moscow's overall plan has four main points:

Consolidate Soviet influence in Angola, Mozambique and Zimbabwe; at the same time enhance the military capabilities of these countries to act as Soviet surrogates; and provide aid sufficient to reduce their economic dependence on South Africa;

Strengthen the underground organization of the African National Congress and its fronts inside South Africa;

Weaken the South African military capacity and will to resist;

Increase the international political and economic isolation of South Africa through an intensified "active measures" campaign in Europe and America.

The international campaign for United Nations imposition of a total mandatory and binding international economic boycott against South Africa is spearheaded by various African states backed to the hilt by the Soviet bloc. Both in America and in the European countries who are South Africa's major trading partners, the campaigns are coordinated by the ANC's solidarity networks. (Shades of the various Central American solidarity networks, e.g., CISPES).

There is some peculiar self-delusion found among ANC supporters. Some back ANC because they see it as their revolutionary duty to support so-called "national liberation movements." Overall, they are a minority. Many more among the public figures in the so-called "anti-apartheid' campaigns understand that the brutal assassinations of moderate black spokesmen, community leaders, individuals known to oppose ANC, police officers and those who work in some capacity for the government, the atrocities in which ANC-inspired mobs hack and burn alive the infants, children, wives and other relatives of their victims or intended victims, the car bombs and sabotage are prima facie evidence that ANC is a terrorist group of the most vicious nature. Even Bishop Desmond Tutu has implored the militants to stop their reign of terror—or "I'll pack my bags, collect my family and leave," as he himself put it last week. But our activists omit from their calculations those atrocities perpetrated on blacks by the ANC and South African Communist Party and deplore the fact that the white government has declared a state of emergency to put down the terror.

At bottom, the excuses for ANC terrorism amount to "the devil made them do it"—the devil being South Africa's racial policies. When did the fact that you do not like someone's presumed politics give you the right to disembowel his wife and burn his children to death? Individuals are responsible for their own actions; no one who argues that a grievance against society justifies murder can retain credibility as a "human rights" advocate. Those who take that position may well believe that similar tactics should be applied in America. Even six generations after civil war and 30 years after the civil rights movement was launched, we have failed to construct the racial utopia that is demanded overnight of South Africa. Thirty-five million Americans are living below the poverty line—most of them blacks. Does that justify terrorism?

The fact that South Africa has scrapped many repugnant racial rules seems to have no impact on the anti-South Africa lobby. Perhaps with their minds made up, they do not want to be confused by facts. They want revolution.

The strategic needs of our own people should be the overriding concern of Congress, but the anit-South Africa forces, including the Marxists, are arguing that apartheid problem is not a political one capable of rational political solutions involving formulae for opening the South African political power structure by degrees to all the people. Rather they say it is a moral issue. So they preach that "apartheid" is a sin, and that those "sinners" should stop sinning at once without respect to any other consideration such as transferring power in an orderly manner and maintaining social order. Pretoria, for its part, should begin by bringing black leaders, who renounce violence, into a new powersharing system.

ANTI-SOUTH AFRICAN LOBBY TRACED TO LEFT-WING GROUPS

(By Arnaud de Borchgrave)

Dennis V. Brutus, 60, one of the most influential political leaders of the anti-South Africa lobby in America, told an activist audience in Washington recently that the key U.S. groups in the network against South Africa were the American Committee on Africa (ACOA); Washington Office on Africa (WOA); TransAfrica and the coalition it heads called the Free South Africa Movement (FSAM); and the Institute for Policy Studies (IPS).

If his audience was particularly pleased, it may have been because he was addressing an IPS seminar audience that was representative of those organizations. He himself is prominent in the U.S. committee of the London-based International Defence and Aid Fund (IDAF) and The Africa Network (TAN), and was co-founder of the American Coordinating Committee for Equality in Sport and Society (ACCESS), which took the lead in setting up protests against a tour by South Africa's Springbok rugby team.

Mr. Brutus was born in Rhodesia and is a citizen of Zimbabwe. He left South Africa for London in 1966, having become active with the African National Congress (ANC) in the carly 1950s. His current role, is to present the political action desires of the ANC to the intellectual leaders and activists of the American left. He is effective at that. With turmoil in South Africa having driven Communist expansionism in Central America from the headlines, The Washington Times will examine some key organizations of the Network against South Africa.

The International Defence and Aid Fund was established in London in the 1960s by South African "exiles" to raise funds to help defray legal defense costs for black South Africans charged with treason, terrorism and other serious offenses. Mr. Brutus has been involved with IDAF for many years.

As for the activist credentials of Mr. Brutus, from 1948 to 1961 he taught English and Afrikaans in various South African schools, became active in ANC, and founded the campaign to expel South Africa from international sporting events. The 1961-63 period encompassed ANC's first terrorist campaign and his ANC affiliation cost Mr. Brutus his government teaching post. He was arrested in 1963 for violating the terms of his banning and was released on pretrial bond.

Mr. Brutus' reaction to this was extraordinary. He promptly fled to Mozambique where he was arrested by the Portugese and extradited to South Africa.

Mr. Brutus served an 18-month sentence on Robben Island where he was in the same work detail as Nelson Mandela of the ANC. Mr. Brutus claims to have hidden Mr. Mandela in his home while an underground fugitive. On his release, Mr. Brutus took his wife and seven children to London, where he led a number of campaigns organized by IDAF.

In 1978, the London Economist's prestigious Foreign Report published discussion documents by a Dutch support group for the ANC called Ikhela. The word means "spark" in Zulu, echoing Lenin's "Iskra" publication, which was "spark" in Russian. Members of the Dutch leftist group came to support a "black nationalist" faction in ANC. In defense of that faction, which wanted to expel the white Communists from ANC, they commented that "since the very beginning, the politics of the liberation movement in exile has been under the domination of the South African Communist Party;" and that as a result of SACP dominance, only two issues "formed the backbone of the antiapartheid politics: the disinvestment issue and the armed struggle."

Ikhela criticized the IDAF as "an inconsistent jelly fish" that "appears to be Christian-motivated," but accepts a program politically "run along highly sectarian lines" and is "controlled by members of the South African Communist Party."

IDAF has received substantial grants from the World Council of Churches, the U.S. National Council of Churches and from the government of the Ukranian Soviet Socialist Republic in other words, the government of the Soviet Union. The Ukranian SSR told the U.N. General Assembly it was "making regular contributions to the International Defence and Aid Fund."

There is no evidence in the public record that Mr. Brutus is a secret member of the South African Communist Party. In 1970, he moved to the United States to teach literature at Northwestern University. He did not come for political reasons or to seek political asylum, but, as he told The Washington Post more recently, because "Northwestern made me the best offer." Mr. Brutus has been associated with a number of anti-South African groups, and prominently with the U.S. committee of the IDAF. The U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service tried for years to deport Mr. Brutus as an excludable alien under the McCarran Act provisions barring communists and members of communist-controlled organizations. The government was not willing to disclose to Mr. Brutus or his attorneys from Chicago's People's Law Office the sources of their intelligence concerning him. Declassified FBI documents and Justice Department legal papers have linked People's Law Office lawyers and staff to the terrorist Weather Underground Organization and to the Puerto Rican FALN (Armed Forces of National Liberation of Puerto Rico).

In 1983, after two years of proceedings, during which Mr. Brutus' cause was supported by Chicago Mayor Harold Washington, Cardinal Joseph Bernardin, former Illinois Sen. Charles Percy (who then was chairman of the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee), House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., Sens. Howard Metzenbaum, Edward Kennedy and then Massachusetts Sen. Paul Tsongas, a federal judge granted Mr. Brutus political asylum in the United States.

KGB FRONTS PUSH CAMPAIGN TO DESTABILIZE SOUTH AFRICA

(By Arnaud de Borchgrave)

The protest campaign against South Africa corresponds to a pattern established by the Soviet KGB as one part of a broad "active measures" campaign that is being implemented by the U.S.S.R.'s "assets"—witting and unwitting—in the United States and Western Europe.

Is there collateral for that assertion? Yes, from the Federal Bureau of Investigation. FBI Assistant Director Edward O'Malley, in testimony before the House Intelligence Committee, held up as an example of "specific Soviet active measure, activities and operations in the United States" a conference of anti-South African activists in New York. Many of the initiators and leaders of the present protest participated actively in that conference whose "stars" were the political leadership of the African National Congress (ANC), which resumed terrorist operations against civilian targets in South Africa after the former Portuguese colonies of Mozambique and Angola achieved independence under Soviet-allied Marxist regimes and provided ANC with bases.

In 1961, at the instigation of the South African Communist Party (SACP), the ANC commenced a terrorist campaign. ANC formed a terrorist cadre called "Umkonto We Sizwe" (Spear of the Nation in Zulu), led by Nelson Mandela, who was not a member of the Communist Party but worked closely with it.

Not too long ago. The New York Times commented that Mr. Mandela would probably become the first black prime minister in the "new order" in South Africa. When he was on trial, Mr. Mandela delivered a statement in open court in which he said, "I admit immediately . . . that I was one of the persons who helped to form Umkonto We Sizwe, and that I played a prominent role in its affairs until I was arrested in August 1962." He said, "I do not deny that I planned sabotage," and continued, "I did not plan it . . . because I have any love of violence. I planned it as a result of a calm and sober assessment of the political situation. . . ." (Note: Quoted in THE AFRICAN COMMUNIST, official publication of the SACP, 3rd Quarter, 1964.)

The terrorist campaign failed. There was no rebellion, and the ANC and the SACP were outlawed and dwindled. They became primarily exile movements based in London whose publications were produced in East Germany. During the late 1960s and through the 1970s, ANC cadre received training in the Soviet bloc, Algeria, Libya, several Marxist African states and in Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) camps. Johnstone Makatini, the ANC representative in Algiers during the early 1970s, now their U.N. observer, was responsible for organizing terrorist training for selected ANC members in the Soviet Union.

Following the Portuguese "carnation revolution" of 1974, pro-Soviet regimes too power in Mozambique and Angola which gave ANC training facilities after the 1976 Soweto riots produced a flood of new militant recruits. The camps were staffed by Cuban, East German, Soviet and other bloc experts. Selected ANC members were given advanced training in the Soviet Union, Cuba and several East European countries.

The principal coordinator of the Free South Africa Movement (FSAM) is Randall Robinson, executive director of TransAfrica, a self-described "lobby" formed eight years ago "to inform and organize popular opinion in the United States to advocate policies and practices that will help to achieve more progressive U.S. forign policy toward the nations of Africa and the Caribbean and peoples of African descent generally throughout the world." As translated into action. TransAfrica has promoted the interests of the ANC, SWAPO and Moscow-allied client regimes in Africa and the Caribbean. The link with the ANC has been open.

Recently, Dennis Brutus, a "political refugee" who successfully resisted U.S. efforts to deport him as an "excludable alien" under the McCarran act, and is one of the most influential interpreters of ANC's political wishes to the U.S. anti-South Africa movement, described the American Friends Service Committee (AFSC), Washington Office on Africa (WOA), American Committee on Africa (ACOA), TransAfrica and its Free South Africa Coalition (FSAM), and the Institute for Policy Studies (IPS) as providing the leadership for the U.S. anti-South Africa campaign.

Those ties are not recent developments. There was, for example, a conference on American divestment legislation supported by the United Nations Special Committee Against Apartheid and nine American groups in June 1981. Organizations taking leadership roles included the AFSC, ACOA, IPS, TransAfrica and WOA, along with several projects set up jointly and separately by these groups. ANC president Oliver Tambo had met with some of the leading figures a week before the conference in Atlanta. Others prominent in the conference were members of TransAfrica's board along with some leaders of communist front organizations used by the Soviets as vehicles for "active measures" and "disinformation" operations.

During the last four years, Mr. Tambo has made repeated trips to the United States for meetings with his U.S. supporters.

The October 1981 "Conference in Solidarity with the Liberation Struggles of Southern Africa," named by FBI Assistant Director O'Malley as a classic example of Soviet "active measures," had at least 20 officials of the ANC present. ANC president Tambo was unable to attend, but the ANC delegation "working" the conference was ably headed by Thabo Mbeki, Mr. Tambo's personal aide; Johnstone Mfanafuthi Makatini, ANC's chief U.N. representative, Yusuf Saloojee, ANC's representative in Canada; David Ndaba of the U.N. observer delegation, and others.

As violence erupted in the black townships of South Africa, Mr. Ndaba, administrative secretary of ANC's U.N. group who said he was involved in the Soweto riots of 1976, explained ANC's rationale for violence against black and colored moderates. The aim is to destroy by terrorism any alternative or moderate voice to the ANC and to use terror to bring the urban black population under ANC control. Any form of cooperation with the system would bring death and would demonstrate to black moderates that the government was incapable of protecting them from ANC violence.

Mr. Ndaba described the riots as "mass struggles carried out . . . to destroy the . . . institutions which make it possible for that regime to dominate our people. These mass political actions are accompanied by armed actions carried out by the . . . African National Congress."

Terming the violence that has killed an estimated 450 black South Africans "people's war," Mr. Ndaba noted that in a New Year's message last year, several weeks before South Africa and Mozambique signed the Nkomati pact that brought expulsion of the ANC from their Mozambican bases, Oliver Tambo called on ANC supporters "to make themselves ungovernable, to make apartheid institutions unworkable, and to challenge these institutions by confronting the most vulnerable links of the apartheid regime, and eventually, to change the racist rule in Pretoria."

The slaughter of black people at the hands of the ANC mobs did not seem to upset Mr. Ndaba, who said that "a number of black stooges have been killed; many heads of black townships have been petrol-bombed because the people are now challenging these collaborators. . . . The issue of black collaborators is becoming . . . a major issue." [NOTE: Interview was published in The Black Scholar, a Marxist monthly—contributing editors range from Angela Davis and several TransAfrica directors to leaders of terrorist Republic of New Afrika.]

During the congressional debates on economic sanctions against South Africa, many wondered whether U.S. measures to isolate South Africa were of any real significance. ANC's U.N. officials insist that the campaign against South Africa here is critical to their success.

Mr. Ndaba said at the start of the FSAM protests that "We will appeal to the black people in this country to take their place as the leading force of the anti-apartheid movement in this country. . . . It won't be until the Afro-Americans have taken the struggles . . . to the same level as Americans did in opposing the war in Vietnam that we will finally achieve our freedom." That ANC officials likened South Africa to "another Vietnam war" that produced over a million refugee "boat people" could indicate what lies in store for South Africa should ANC be victorious.

Mr. Ndaba said, "How long the struggle will be allowed to last depends to a great extent on how strong an anti-apartheid movement will develop in the United States to reverse the policies of the U.S. administration with whomever is in power—Republicans or Democrats. . . . It is true that the liberation of the people of South Africa will be brought about by the people of South Africa. . . . But the international community and Afro-Americans here can really play a complementary role. What we are saying is that this complementary role is indispensable. We can no longer do without your support, and the time for that support is now."

Mr. Ndaba's boss at the U.N. observer group, Mr. Makatini, confirmed the high value the ANC places on the U.S. anti-South Africa campaigns to ease the path for their armed revolution during his March 29 appearance on the MacNeil-Lehrer Newshour. During the interview, Mr. Makatini said the current level of violent protests in South Africa meant people were reaching "the position reached by the ANC in 1961—that non-violence could not work against the apartheid regime." He continued indicating that ANC's 1961 venture into terrorist "armed struggle" failed in large part because South Africa was isolated and the neighboring territories were "under colonial domination themselves. . . . But today, they are potential rear bases, and nothing can stop that revolution. Nothing."

Asked whether there was an alternative to violent revolution, Mr. Makatini did not directly answer. Instead he asked for "effective international action in the form of the imposition of comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against South Africa," and explained: "That would help to shorten the duration of the inevitable armed conflict. It would help lessen the loss of human lives. But nothing can stop the bloodshed now because we've been bleeding for the past 300 years, and it's soon that the bleeding has to be on both sides."

South Africa's Survival Essential to U.S. as Source of Key Materials

Leaders of the U.S. network against South Africa concentrate on creating a public sense of mutual repugnance surrounding apartheid and the injustices of the South African system. So far, so good. At least on the surface.

Censorship by omission, however, as wheeled into play when it comes to the U.S. national interest in maintaining a steady supply of strategic minerals. In the Free World only South Africa produces many of the strategic minerals essential in defense and modern industry. To boycott South Africa would render the Soviet Union our sole source for these minerals.

During the Rhodesian boycott, the Soviet Union quickly snapped up Rhodesian chrome—no compunction at all about trading through third parties with a white supremacist regime—and sold it back to the United States at a premium.

The politicians and "solidarity" activists of Europe and America do not have a monopoly on this sort of hypocrisy. When speaking privately with leaders of the black-ruled countries of southern and central Africa, I found a keen recognition that the economic survival of their countries depends on South Africa.

Zambia, Zimbabwe, Angola, Mozambique, Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, even Nigeria (albeit covertly), and other African states rely on South Africa for much of their technology and skilled technicians; for food and other imports; as an export market and for assistance in getting their goods to world markets; and for the foreign exchange earned in South Africa by their black citizens who find jobs there.

Revolution in South Africa would mean disaster for black Africans. Nevertheless, whenever the United Nations is assembled, its diplomats stand up and pronounce dire imprecations on the heads of South African whites while singing the praises of the African National Congress terrorists and blacks killing other blacks for "collaboration" with the government.

Among the U.S. groups that have pioneered the "moral" argument for sanctions against, and revolutionary change in, South Africa are the American Committee on Africa (ACOA) and its "independent" spin-off, the Washington Office on Africa (WOA); the American Friends Service Committee (AFSC); TransAfrica; and the Institute for Policy Studies (IPS). Each has provided "moral support" and sometimes more to the African National Congress (ANC), whose Soviet-allied revolutionaries began committing acts of terrorism against civilians more than two decades ago.

AMERICAN COMMITTEE ON AFRICA

George Houser, founder and executive director of the American Committee on Africa, celebrated the 25th anniversary of the organization by writing a booklet history of the committee called "Meeting Africa's Challenge: The Story of the American Committee on Africa."

According to Mr. Houser, now retired from ACOA, the impetus for the committee arose in 1951 during London meetings between U.S. black Activist Bill Sutherland and the editor of ANC's newspaper, "African World," who told Mr. Sutherland about ANC's plans to launch the "Defiance Campaign" of the early 1950s. When Mr. Sutherland returned to the United States, he told Mr. Houser, who then was executive secretary of the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) and race relations secretary of the Fellowship of Reconciliation (FOR), about ANC's plans. Still, according to Mr. Houser, "We wrote to Walter Sisulu, the secretary general of the African National Congress . . . [who] responded eagerly, and in New York we decided to set up an ad hoc organization, which we called Americans for South African Resistance (AFSAR), in support of this campaign."

Mr. Houser reported that when the "Defiance Campaign" started in June 1952, its link to the ANC was Professor Z.K. Matthews, head of ANC's Cape branch, who had just arrived to teach at Union Theological Seminary. He remained in "constant touch" with ANC leaders in South Africa, and he was the source for bulletins issued by AFSAR. Mr. Houser also said that "AFSAR . . . raised several thousand dollars which, through Z.K. Matthews, was sent to ANC." When the ANC effort collapsed in 1953. AFSAR was reorganized into ACOA. The "Defiance" support set the pattern for ACOA activities.

Mr. Houser's organization shifted its focus to supporting Algeria's National Liberation Front (FLN) whose eight-year civil war was marked by atrocities and violence and repression that left one million dead.

Mr. Houser explained that "ACOA worked closely with . . . the FLN representatives in New York and at the U.N. Numerous public meetings were sponsored to call attention to the Algerian struggle and to condemn the support the U.S. was giving France." He also recalled that ACOA was the first to display the flag of the FLN's provisional revolutionary government at public meetings in New York.

Mr. Houser claimed that "there is not a major liberation movement in southern Africa which has not received some support from ACOA." "Much of this," he volunteered, "has been done through the Africa Defense and Aid Fund . . . sometimes the assistance given is to cover the emergency needs of visitors to New York and U.N. or to liberation movement leaders traveling in the U.S. It may help with travel expenses, accommodations, telephone bills, etc. . . . In the case of some of the liberation movements. . . . ACOA has taken major responsibility for raising the funds to make it possible for the organization to have an office and a full-time representative here."

During the 1970s, Mr. Houser described ACOA logistical support to "liberation movements" as including the supply of vehicles such as jeeps. Land Rovers and Volkswagon buses. Anti-communist and non-communist forces were slighted. For example, in Angola, there were three armed movements: The then-Peking-allied FNLA led by Holden Roberto, the nationalist UNITA headed by Jonas Savimbi and the Soviet-controlled MPLA. According to Mr. Houser, "a lengthy discussion was held in 1970, and the decision was to recognize the primacy of the MPLA at that time." The Marxist-Leninist MPLA, with Soviet assistance and Cuban troops, fought its way to power in 1975.

ACOA's Washington lobbying activities were outlined by Mr. Houser. "ACOA," he wrote, "has consistently opposed U.S. policies" in South Africa. The organization's representatives have appeared on numerous occasions before "the appropriate Senate and House committees. ACOA has kept a full-time office in Washington since 1968. Funds for the Washington operation, according to Mr. Houser's organizational history, have been provided primarily by four religious denominations: "Methodists, Presbyterian, United Church of Christ and Episcopalian." When these churches wanted to take a more active role against South Africa, he explained, "ACOA's Washington office was transformed into the independent, jointly sponsored Washington Office on Africa."

Among the best known ACOA representatives have been Mr. Houser himself before his retirement; Jennifer Davis, a South African "exile" who replaced him as executive director after years as ACOA's research director, and New York attorney Peter Weiss, who was ACOA president for 10 years and provided a significant amount of funding to ACOA's tax-exempt spin-off, The African Fund, through the Samuel Rubin Foundation. Mr. Weiss has performed similar functions on the board of the Institute for Policy Studies (IPS), which has cooperated with the ACOA on campaigns for legislation against U.S. bank loans to South Africa and other issues.

AMERICAN FRIENDS SERVICE COMMITTEE

The Philadelphia-based American Friends Service Committee (AFSC) increased the level of its southern Africa program in 1974 when it hired as program director Bill Sutherland, co-founder of ACOA. Mr. Sutherland moved to Africa in 1953 and later worked for the first government of Ghana under Kwame Nkrumah. He played a role in organizing the 1958 All African Peoples Conference in Accra. From 1963 to 1975, Mr. Sutherland was an employee of the Tanzanian Ministry of Foreign Affairs. When he went to work for the AFSC, he moved to Lusaka, Zambia.

The general trend of the AFSC southern Africa program was visible in the August 1977 16-member AFSC delegation Mr. Sutherland led on a tour of the "front-line" states. The proclaimed purpose was to "build relationships with the opponents of the status quo in southern Africa, particularly the liberation movements."

TRANS AFRICA

The principal coordinator of the Free South Africa Movement (FSAM) protest coalition is Randall Robinson, executive director of TransAfrica. The group was formed eight years ago "to inform and organize popular opinion in the United States to advocate policies and practices that will help to achieve a more progressive U.S. foreign policy toward the nations of Africa and the Caribbean and peoples of African descent generally throughout the world."

As this policy was translated into action. TransAfrica has promoted the interests of the ANC, the South-West Africa People's Organization (SWAPO) and Moscow-allied client regimes in Africa and the Caribbean. The link with the ANC has been open.

After graduating from Harvard Law School, Mr. Robinson worked in Tanzania as a Ford Foundation fellow before returning to Boston to practice public interest law. In 1975 he joined the staff of Rep. William Clay, D-Mo. Later he worked for Rep. Charles Diggs, D-Mich. ACOA's former executive director, George Houser, wrote that his organization had "maintained a working relationship" with Mr. Diggs, who was chairman of the House subcommittee on Africa. Mr. Robinson was executive director of the Congressional Black Caucus before taking on the TransAfrica project. His brother is Chicago-based television newsman Max Robinson.

The roll call of past and present members of the TransAfrica board of directors includes Harry Belafonte; the Rev. Isaac Bivens, United Methodist Church Board of Global Missions; Courtland Cox; Dr. Carlton Goodlett, for many years a member of the Presidium of the Soviet controlled World Peace Council and publisher of two San Francisco area black community newspapers; William Lucy of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME); R. Prexy Nesbitt, former IPS fellow who headed the World Council of Churches Program to Combat Racism; the Rev. Wyatt Tee Walker; and Ronald Walters.

The list shows a preponderance of personalities on the left wing of the American political spectrum with respect to South Africa and other social issues.

INSTITUTE FOR POLICY STUDIES

The Institute for Policy Studies (IPS), which has offices just off Dupont Circle in Washington has amassed a 20-year public record remarkable for its consistency in supporting disarmament (by the West), nonintervention against Soviet surrogates, but intervention against authoritarian governments aligned with the West, abolition of nuclear power (by the West), and the drastic curtailment of intelligence and internal security agencies (the American ones).

IPS and its subsidiary, the Transnational Institute (TNI), which has offices in Amsterdam as well as in IPS's Washington headquarters, play central roles in coordinating pressure campaigns on parliaments in Europe and on the U.S. Congress for such policies. In part, IPS exercises influences through a network of "progressive" congressional staff aides. IPS has acted as a conduit for Soviet and Cuban disinformation themes.

In 1982, the institute concluded a formal "exchange" agreement with the Arbatov Institute in Moscow and another Soviet agency, both used by Soviet intelligence for "active measures." The IPS/Soviet 1983 "Bilateral Exchange" conference in Minneapolis attracted Soviet GRU (military intelligence) Gen. Mikhail Milsteyn and others from those agencies experienced in "active measures" and political influence operations.

IPS Chairman Peter Weiss was president of ACOA for 10 years. Other IPS figures have been affiliated with the committee. Members of IPS's Southern Africa Project and Militarism and Disarmament Project have played key roles in coordinating divestment and antibank loan campaigns in Western Europe and the United States. Indeed, the Committee to Oppose Bank Loans to South Africa operated from IPS's headquarters and ACOA's New York office.

Even more significant was the central role of a member of the ANC and the South African Communist Party Central Committee, Ruth First Slovo, in organizing IPS/TNI solidarity efforts. Ruth First Slovo was killed in 1982 by a parcel bomb which exploded at ANC headquarters in Maputo. Her husband Joe Slovo heads the ANC's "military" arm, the terrorist "Umkonto we Sizwe" cadre. The Lithuanian-born Mr. Slovo, a member of the SACP Politburo and the ANC Revolutionary Council, was a lawyer in South African until ANC and the SACP commenced terrorist operations in the early 1960s. South Africa authorities have identified him as holding the rank of colonel in the Soviet KGB.

Yes, apartheid is repugnant. But there is a lot more to the anti-South African campaign than meets the eye in the current deluge of press releases.

Seeking a Quick Fix—Can it be Achieved Without Patience?

Confronted with a wrong, many Americans have a compulsive urge to do something about it, now. But in a sensitive, explosive situation, "now" can be the worst of times.

One of the wisest of Britain's colonial administrators, Sir David Trench, then governor-general of Hong Kong, commented to me nearly 20 years ago about what he saw as a characteristic flaw in American foreign policy. Americans, he said, "seem to have a passion for tying up all the loose ends. Out here, it's often better to leave a few loose ends dangling."

He was right. Patience with "loose ends" is particularly needed when engineering social transformations that pose irreconcilable conflicts among the vital interests of contending groups.

For example, South Africa.

In such a situation, time is needed not only to allay fears and modify attitudes, but also to alter those conditions that make the present circumstances so intractable.

America's new relationship with China, for example, was made possible by deliberately leaving loose ends untied: in particular, by a carefully crafted formula that deferred resolution of the Taiwan issue. Both sides have lived, however uncomfortably, with an understanding that recognizes the principle of one China (a principle that both Peking and Taiwan proclaim) but accepts the present existence of two governments. The dramatic evolution of mainland China suggests that time will, in fact, bring a way to bridge the unbridgeable gulf. As conditions in China change, an eventual voluntary union, under terms that recognize a special status for the Taiwanese, seems increasingly possible.

Some will argue that the Taiwan analogy is irrelevant: that the Taiwan dispute is political and therefore tolerable, while the problem in South Africa is one of racial oppression and therefore intolerable.

However, branding a situation "intolerable" does not create an alternative that will be both tolerable and achievable. The Soviet hold on Eastern Europe is intolerable, but we and the Eastern Europeans have tolerated it for almost 40 years. We fulminate against it, but we don't send NATO armies crashing across the East German frontier and we don't break diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union. We learned tragically in Hungary in 1956 that encouraging rebellion when we were not in a position to assist that rebellion was, to put it gently, not helpful.

Short term, there simply is no way to restore freedom to Eastern Europe. Long term, there is hope that Eastern Europe will evolve toward freedom.

Tolerating the intolerable, for a time, can be the price of achieving the unachievable. In activities as diverse as love, baseball, politics, and show business, timing is crucial. So, too, in diplomacy. Conditions change. Rulers change. Systems change. Attitudes change. Interests change. What one party to a dispute finds unacceptable today, it may find acceptable tomorrow.

In South Africa, the conflict is not simply black vs. white. The country's whites are also divided, some protesting that the pace of reform is too fast, others that it is too slow. (The nation's most powerful business leader, Sir Harry Oppenheimer, is pressing for more reform.) And blacks as well as whites have cause to fear a too precipitate change.

To see cause for fear, all they have to do is look north. Africa is a continental catastrophe. In Uganda—where another coup has just ushered in another regime, promising like those before it to redress the sins of its predecessors—the 100,000 Ugandans killed by their government in recent years have been black, not white. Some had their legs chopped off and were forced to eat the flesh of their fellow prisoners before they themselves were put to death. In country after country, the post-colonial history of the continent has been a tragic chronicle of hopes betrayed, of cruelty, tyranny, corruption, and failure.

In the worlds' haste to press independence on the African colonies, it was politically easier to be on the side of immediate "change" than to insist on the patience to prepare the way for it, and to accept for a while a temporary wrong in order to achieve a permanent right. Hundreds of millions of black Africans today are paying a terrible price for that impatience.

South Africa is changing. It will continue to change. With luck, change may come at a pace that allows South Africans, black, white, "colored," and Asian alike, to evolve a genuinely multiracial society that preserves the country's strengths while correcting its shortcomings. But achieving this will require leaving some of the loose ends untied. And it will require time, patience, and forebearance, not only from South Africans, but also from the world.

Abhorrent System: But Why Do Blacks Still Come There?

My urbane friend and colleague William Rusher notes the comically repetitive formula with which South Africa's racial system is routinely censured: one is required to use the adjective "abhorrent." I think "South Africa's abhorrent system of apartheid" must be the most frequently repeated phrase since "Polly want a cracker?"

Now, nobody feels compelled to refer to "the Soviet Union's abhorrent system of communism," even though that system is obviously far worse than apartheid. The first distinction between forms of government is not whether they are democratic or undemocratic, capitalist or socialist, or even free or unfree; it is whether they are bearable or unbearable.

Apartheid, whatever else it has done, has not driven blacks out of South Africa; on the contrary, South Africa, even with apartheid, attracts black immigration. South Africa has no equivalent of the Berlin Wall; it has no need, as communist systems do, to treat its people as captives who must be prevented from escaping. It is necessary to cling to such basic facts during the storms of propaganda.

So why do we make such a point of calling apartheid "abhorrent"? It's a matter of informal etiquette, like smiling and nodding while shaking hands. It's supposed to show our benevolence toward black people and our detestation—embarrassment, really—at the very idea of white rule.

The white man has been deeply embarrassed about white rule, or "colonialism," for a generation. But we can take this too far: Africa has paid dearly for the biracial mania for getting rid of white rule. The last 25 years have been bitter ones for such newly free African countries as Uganda, Nigeria, Angola, and Mozambique, to name a few.

An article in the Wall Street Journal mentions a farmer in Ghana, who performed a strange ritual before a reporter: He sprinkled a few drops of scotch on the ground, as a sort of sacrifice, and began a chant. His son explained: "He's praying that the British will come back and make everyone rich."

An English friend of mine tells of a recent trip to Jamaica, which he found sadly dilapidated. He told a native that it was his first visit there since the '50s, when the British still ruled the island. "Ah," said the Jamaican, "the good old days"—then caught himself, embarrassed at what he had admitted. Another friend, just back from India, met an Indian who has a recurrent dream that the British have returned. When he wakes up and finds they haven't, he cries.

Touching stories. They undermine the myth that colonialism was purely evil. In fact no empire can endure unless it brings prosperity to its provinces, as the Roman and British empires did. White rule had its benefits, not because it was white, but because white men happened to be the vehicles of civilization and the rule of law, even when their motives were selfish. The tragedy is that the colonial peoples got their independence before they had fully absorbed the civilized tradition. The poor Ghanaian farmer who thinks the British can magically bring wealth makes the same mistake as the doctrinaire racist: He thinks race itself is the key. But civilized habits are slow to develop and easy to abandon, as the history of Europe in this century proves.

In their way, the liberated African nations have been the victims of an obsession with race. They thought that getting rid of white rule would solve all their problems; and they dispensed with the good institutions that the white man had brought. It was right and natural that they should want independence; it was shortsighted to throw away the rule of law.

The American revolution succeeded because the Americans were fighting less to get free of England than to keep the traditional freedoms of Englishmen. They were fighting not to destroy, but to conserve.

South Africa has several free institutions that are likewise worth conserving: the rule of law, a market economy, an independent judiciary, a free press. These should be reformed to extend their benefits to blacks, not sacrificed to crude majority rule, especially if such rule would have the character of the murderous mobs who burn and hack to death suspected government informers.

In order to conserve, as Edmund Burke said, you must be able to reform. But to reform you must also know what to conserve. And there are few signs that most of the people who want to destroy the "abhorrent system" even realize that they have anything to lose. They may find out only when they have lost it. It would be a bitter irony if, a few years down the road, South Africa's blacks were praying vainly for the return of white rule.

Very Vicious Circle

The South African government, like the governments of eastern Europe, believes in crushing dissent rather than dealing with it by negotiation. It assumes that concessions made under duress will be taken as weakness. As a result, President Botha has got caught on an escalator of repression. The present wave of unrest in the African townships began 10 months ago. On July 20th Mr. Botha declared a state of emergency in nearly all the urban areas of Eastern Cape and the industrial heartland of Transvaal.

Will this stamp out the trouble and enable Mr. Botha to start considering the big political changes needed to calm the black townships? Probably not. Before the emergency was declared, the government already had formidable powers of arbitrary arrest and detention. It could banish people without giving reasons. It could hold them for interrogation for as long as it wished. South Africa has long been in a state of undeclared emergency. The declaration is primarily a symbolic gesture. Mr. Botha wants to be seen, especially by his constituency of fellow-Afrikaners, to be acting tough.

There is, though, nothing new about Mr. Botha's toughness. He has always tried to squash dissent. When demonstrations began last August, in support of a campaign to boycott Indian and mixed-race elections to Mr. Botha's new three-chamber parliament, riot police used batons and tear-gas to keep the campaigners away from the polling booths. That was like a match to a tinder of resentment among opponents of the new constitution, particularly among the black Africans who were pointedly excluded from the reforms.

Within days the flames began licking into some of the black townships. By chance, the first to ignite was Sharpeville, whose name is woven into the soul of black resistance because of the 67 protesters killed there by the police 25 years ago. This time the government had handed powers of local government to a number of black township councils as a compensation for excluding blacks from national politics. In practice, black councillors, instead of white civil servants, became the everyday administrators of these apartheid ghettoes.

When feelings were already running high over the Indian and mixed-race elections, and with clashes occurring regularly between demonstrators and the police, the council administering Sharpeville and five neighboring townships announced a big increase in house rents. The tenants rebelled. Young radicals turned on the councillors, burning their houses and killing two of them.

If Mr. Botha had then made a conciliatory gesture—a declaration of intent, perhaps, that he had some political plans in mind for the blacks—he might have dampened the fury. Instead, he sent in the riot police. He said he regarded the unrest as a communist-inspired campaign to sabotage his reforms. Dissenters would be crushed.

A vicious circle of anger and repression began. As the troubles spread, the government sent the army for the first time into the township, where it has been sporadically in action ever since. Soldiers surrounded four of the townships, while policemen went from house to house on search-and-interrogation work. Then the fledgling trade unions were sucked in. The infuriated townsdwellers of the industrialized areas got their own labour unions to protest. Until then the unions had tried to avoid overt politics. After a three-day strike, the government detained the country's two top black union leaders. The unions were now in the fray.

At each attempt by the government to snuff out the rebellion, the township revolt has become more violent and purposeful. Last March, in the eastern part of the Cape province, riot police stopped carrying tear-gas and rubber-bullet guns, and used real guns instead. On March 22nd police killed 20 people in Langa township.

Since September about 500 blacks have been killed, more than 2,000 injured and more than 3,000 arrested. The black radicals are now waging open war against black councillors and others they call collaborators. Some 120 councillors have been attacked and five killed, including a mayor and two deputy-mayors, and 75 have had their homes burnt down. Of the 38 councils granted the highest level of autonomy, only two are reported to be functioning.

The Not-Quite Revolution

Draw no premature conclusions from President Botha's "state of emergency". The edifice of white power in South Africa may be trembling, but it is not about to crumble. The country's black majority is justifiably and increasingly angry, but it does not follow that revolution will come tomorrow. South Africa's is not Iran. If South Africa's present Shah-of-the-Afrikaners were to bow out, there would be another to replace him. The whites have the guns, the blacks do not; and Mr. Botha's army and police force, though they have a growing black component, will not turn the guns on the big white chief. South Africa's blacks still lack the unifying do-or-die zeal of Shia Islam. The size of the recent wave of rebellious black optimism could make an ensuing trough of black despair even deeper.

Mr. Botha's declaration of a state of emergency on July 20th may mark a symbolic step along the bloody road to freedom or chaos (or both), but it brings no dramatic change in the balance of real power. The apparatus of repression was very nearly as powerful last week as it is now. Mr. Botha's main motive in raising the storm-flag is less to frighten the blacks than to impress his white constituents that he is not going soft in the face of black fury; and to show the outside world that the growing international disapproval of the past six months leaves him unmoved.

But Something Has Changed

Yet the not-quite revolution will go on, and Mr. Botha would be foolish to think otherwise. Since the Soweto troubles nearly a decade ago, there has been a steady bulging of black muscle. The past 10 months' violence has been geographically far more widespread. For the first time there is a fierce sharpening of the conflict among blacks themselves: about a quarter of those killed have been "system blacks"—black policemen, urban councillors, alleged collaborators—regarded as stooges by the militants. The black trade unions have grown apace, and have not confined themselves to pushing up wages; they have become increasingly ready to use their new-found strength to win political concessions. Mr. Botha's biggest outside ally, President Reagan, may soon turn his back on him, and European conservatives are wearily exasperated. This time the blacks, more sophisticated and more determined, have reason to be more confident.

So, even if white power is not immediately threatened, President Botha is politically beleaguered. On the face of things, so long as the economy ticks over and the killing does not spread to the white suburbs or the city centres, he can ignore black riots, and move on with the reforms which have already tossed a sop to the critics of apartheid. The trouble is that Mr. Botha looks more and more like a man who does not know where he is going.

His reforms so far have been designed to cut out the most impractical bits of apartheid, and to steamline the rest: to apply white power more flexibly, not to throw it away. Many people outside South Africa welcomed even this limited change. They argued that, although Mr. Botha is no liberal, once he started picking little holes in apartheid he would find himself, willy-nilly, gradually taking the whole construction to bits. That may still prove true. But once Mr. Botha saw the holes appearing more rapidly than he had foreseen, he shrank back from drilling more of them.

When a government-funded Afrikaner think-tank told him last month to scrap apartheid altogether, he told it to shut up. He still cannot help looking over his shoulder at those whites who believe he has already gone too far, and at the increasingly political South African generals who think the police force can no longer be trusted to run the black townships. And—the American and other disinvestment lobbies please note—when foreigners start poking Afrikaners like Mr. Botha too vigorously in the ribs, they tend to march smartly in the opposite direction from the one the rib-pokers want.

If Mr. Botha is to get back to any sort of reformist course, he has to return to the craft of politics, not the thump of repression. He has four years until the next parliamentary election. During this time he should have the guts to ignore the fears of the Afrikaner diehards, and gamble that the whites with eyes to see will come to terms with the black reality around them. He can:

Make a declaration of intent that he will grant full citizenship, under one constitution, to South Africans of all colours;

Draw up an agenda for a national convention to be attended by all South African leaders, including those of the banned African National Congress;

Release Mr. Nelson Mandela, leader of the ANC, provided he tells his followers to stop the violence, in return for the concessions mentioned above;

Suggest that Natal-cum-KwaZulu, where the Zulus Chief Gatsha Buthelezi has kept things astonishingly quiet, should embark on a provincial experiment in multiracial government that might become the model for a future South African federation.

Abandon the proposals for new regional councils, which are to be run on apartheid lines, and give local government in black and white areas real autonomy and much more money.

Some important blacks, such as Mr. Buthelezi and the Nobel prizewinner Bishop Tutu, still show a striking restraint. They do not—and should not—insist on immediate one-man-one-vote in a winner-takes-all unitary state. If there is to be any chance of evolutionary change in South Africa, it has to be established that 23m blacks will not treat the 8m-plus whites and browns as badly as the minority has treated the majority. A lot of blacks are still willing to accept that. Mr. Botha, having cracked his whip, should now start talking while there are still such people to talk to.

THE ACTION ACT AGAINST VIOLATIONS OF HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed the RECORD a bill which I am introducing called an action act against violations of human rights.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1586

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That

1. The Congress finds that a number of practices by governments on all continents that deprive citizens of their human rights and of full citizenship on the basis of religion, class, race, or national origin. These practices, whether they are called Apartheid, as in South Africa, Socialist Construction as in the Soviet Union and other Communist countries:

A. Deliberately restrict people's right to live and work as they wish, and restrict the right to form free labor unions;

B. Deny meaningful democratic participation in the political process by the majority of the population;

C. Consign most citizens to lives of economic, religious, and cultural deprivation;

D. Deny citizens the right to travel in their country or abroad;

E. Leads to the negation of property rights supposedly guaranteed by local laws;

F. Effectively deprive people of rights enjoyed by others on the basis of religion, class, race, or national origin.

2. Such practices are repugnant to the moral and political values of democratic free societies, and run counter to United States policies to promote democratic governments throughout the world and respect for human rights; and

3. It is the policy of the United States to promote peaceful change in countries where such practices are prevalent through diplomatic means, but also, where necessary and appropriate, through the adoption of other measures, in conjunction with our allies in order to reinforce United States opposition to such practices.

4. The President shall report within eighteen months of the enactment of this statute on which countries have a record equal to or worse than that of South Africa with regard to:

1. Interference with the free movement of persons within the country, interference with the right of persons to reside wherever they wish in the country, or to emigrate.

2. Restriction on the freedom to contract labor, to organize for collective bargaining, on the basis of race, color, creed, class or political affiliation.

3. Slave or forced labor.

4. Denial of equal treatment and due process before civil and criminal courts.

5. Restriction on the free exercise of religion, religious worship, religious instruction, and discrimination in employment, housing or any other respect on the basis of religion.

6. Any other undue burden placed on individuals and families because of their race, religion, national or tribal affiliation, class, or political affiliation.

The President shall report whether and how during the previous twelve months the record of each country with regard to these criteria has improved, remained the same or worsened.

5. The President shall impose the following sanctions upon those countries that have an overall record equal to or worse than that of South Africa and have failed to improve

a. prohibition of sales of U.S. made computer products to any such country;

b. prohibition of purchase by U.S. persons of the five principal export products or commodities of any such country.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I strongly support the conference report on the Anti-Apartheid Action Act of 1985. I believe it sends a clear and strong signal to the South African Government and black community in South Africa, that is, the majority of the people, of our opposition to apartheid, and our determination to take action to move the Government to dismantle its evil and immoral system of apartheid.

By banning the importation of Krugerrands, which are the foremost symbol of apartheid, by prohibiting loans to the Government of South Africa, by restricting computer sales and nuclear trade, we are bringing pressure to bear upon the South African Government and sending an unmistakable message that we are abandoning the administration's failed policy of constructive engagement.

I think that the conference report, which reflects hard work and a good faith effort by all the conferees, is a good measure. It makes an even split between the antiapartheid bill passed by the House of Representatives in June and the Senate version, adopted a few weeks ago. I think all parties are to be congratulated on it.

I hope very much that my colleagues will approve the conference report.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I join with those who have spoken and those who are about to speak in support of this measure.

The chairman of the committee made a very fine statement, and he led the committee very effectively in regard to this issue.

This is vitally important to our country and in terms of the leadership that we should offer in the world morally and more than morally, substantively, on the abomination of apartheid in South Africa. Apartheid is official Government-sponsored, Government-led discrimination, akin in that way to the horrors of the discrimination in Nazi Germany, which I saw at first hand.

The Senate passed a fine measure originally by a very strong vote. The House of Representatives passed an even stronger measure.

Now we have a stronger measure than the original Senate bill before us.

I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to approve this measure and to approve it speedily.

If we do not have that opportunity now, I know that in the course of time we will pass it. It will be more meaningful if we are able to proceed at this point. If we have to wait awhile, so be it. But we have the votes to break a filibuster and we will do so.

The issue tonight is simply this: Who will stand up and vote against apartheid and who will not? Who will bring economic pressure against the South African Government to end this abomination of apartheid and who will not? Who will vote for American ideals of freedom, fair play, and the brotherhood of man, and who will not?

The issue is clear. The line, Mr. President, is drawn.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I believe there are a few times in the history of the Senate when a vote by individual Members of the Senate can send such a powerful signal—to the American people and to people across the world. I hope we will have that opportunity to do so tonight, without efforts to delay this vote by a handful of our colleagues, the same handful that attempted to block the Senate from expressing its will when this legislation was initially brought to the floor of the Senate.

Mr. President, the policy of constructive engagement is dead. The decision that was made last evening in a bipartisan way—between Democrats and Republicans alike, between Senators and Congressmen alike—in signing this conference report sent a very clear signal to the American people and to all the people of South Africa that the American people's representatives no longer want to be identified with the repression and human exploitation of apartheid.

Mr. President, in the past, America has actually been supporting apartheid. Every time a Krugerrand was brought in and sold here in the United States, we were adding a brick to the wall of apartheid. Every time the United States extended a loan to the Government of South Africa, we were financing apartheid. And every time U.S. companies were selling computers to the South African Government we were assisting the South African Government in enforcing the laws of apartheid.

The action that was taken last night, Mr. President, was very clear. Apartheid must end.

This action demonstrates that the American people want to exert what influence they can to assist the forces within South Africa who want peaceful change, to show that there are forces outside of South Africa who also want to assist the process of change such as the United States, such as France, such as Canada, such as the nine European countries which only in the past few hours have withdrawn their ambassadors from South Africa.

Finally, Mr. President, I remember what President Kennedy said 1 year after the announcement of the Alliance for Progress; that those that make peaceful revolution impossible make violent revolution inevitable. How can we possibly accept, that in 1985, as we go into the 1990's and the year 2000, in a country of 23 million people, where 2 million are white and the rest are black or colored or Indian, that those citizens who are not white will be denied citizenship in their own country?

The South Africans are going to have to resolve their own future. But someday South Africa will be free, and I hope that then those individuals who participated in what I hope will be a peaceful revolution will look to the United States once again as a source of hope, a source of inspiration and a country that was true to its own most cherished values.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations has followed this subject with great care, with great concern, and with great prudence. He is aware, as I am sure all of us are, that this is an explosive subject, and he has dealt with it as you deal with explosive subjects. His thorough command of all of the facts and his careful evaluation of all of the factors that affect not only the welfare of the people of South Africa but the interests of the United States of America, have already been expressed in his statement. Very little needs to be added to what he has already said.

I would point out that one of the provisions of the conference report is designed to meet a critical need of the people of South Africa which is not now being met by the present government there. That is the education of new leadership to serve in the future. It is, of course, all very well to say that the 70-percent black majority in South Africa should have a role in the determination of its own destiny. But this is a complex and difficult world and these people have been very largely denied the benefits of adequate modern education.

So in the conference report Senator Lugar is bringing to the Senate tonight there is a provision—I do not think anyone will pretend that it is an adequate provision—but the bill does plant the seed that encourages a greater opportunity for education among the black majority of South Africa.

There was another point raised in opposition to the conference report, that I think deserves attention this evening. It was said that Bishop Tutu had at one time been for restraint in the application of sanctions. I would close by quoting Bishop Tutu's latest comment after he had been denied an interview with Mr. Botha. He said:

> Certainly the young will say we told you so. There is no language they understand other than the language of violence. The young are right. We have nothing to show for the advocacy of nonviolence except the continued intransigence of the government and the escalation of their own violence.

Mr. President, I hope this conference report is adopted.

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, I rise today to give my qualified support to the conference report and the Anti-Apartheid Action Act of 1985. I commend my colleagues for their dedicated efforts to resolve the differences between the House and Senate positions. There were substantial differences between the House and Senate in the legislative approach and solutions to the problems posed by South Africa's policy of apartheid. I believe that most of the measures in the bill represent an effective, appropriate responsible plan for our relations with South Africa.

As I have said before, I believe our policy should build bridges with the black community as we diminish the South African Government's ability and incentive to enforce apartheid. I think this intention is represented by the combination of scholarships to blacks and mandatory fair labor principles balanced with termination of computer sales and bank loans to the South African Government agencies enforcing apartheid.

The bill the Senate passed on July 11 was a first step taken by Congress in its involvement in redefining U.S. policy toward South Africa. As such, it was intended to send a clear message to the South African Government that Congress believes the time has come—indeed the time has passed—for immediate meaningful reforms. Apartheid must end, on this there is unanimous bipartisan support. The bill we passed epitomized the carrot and stick approach. There were positive measures to aid the economically disadvantaged black community and there were negative measures to reflect our dissatisfaction with the Government's policy of apartheid. The negatives were narrowly targeted only at the South African Government. I have discussed the merits of this balanced approach on the floor, before the Senate Foreign Relations, Committee and with my constituents. It is a sensible first step.

I was and remain deeply concerned by the prospect of taking any steps which may jeopardize the economic conditions of the majority of South Africans. I believe the addition of language which bans the sale of Krugerrands may cost black miners jobs. And the loss of jobs can only add to the turmoil we have seen erupt over the last 2 weeks. How will this ban help? When the first black miner is laid off, will he thank the United States for trying to bring an end to apartheid? Let's not forget 465,000 blacks are dependent upon their wages from gold mining. How many of those miners endorsed this ban?

While I am deeply concerned about the addition of this measure, I am hopeful the fact that the ban can be lifted if any of eight conditions are met will provide the necessary incentive for the South African Government to initiate reforms. There is an opportunity for them to be relieved of this burden. There is an opportunity for the South African Government to change their future.

On balance, given the constructive role I believe most of the bill will have I will support its passage. The bill is a first step. It affords the South African Government and the United States Government an opportunity to review and redefine how we will construct and continue our relations in the future. I am hopeful this bill will contribute to a better future for all South Africans.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I rise to voice my strong support for the Anti-Apartheid Action Act of 1985 which was agreed upon in the conference committee yesterday. Our colleagues in the House demonstrated, just a few hours ago, the overwhelming bipartisan support that is behind this bill by voting to pass the conference report by a vote of 380 to 48. I am absolutely delighted by the House action and hope we in the Senate will give this bill the same kind of overwhelming vote of approval.

I believe we need to pass such legislaton—both because it is right and in our national interest to do so. That's why I put in a bill setting forth sanctions against South Africa on the very first day of this session of Congress. And that's why on March 7, 1985, I joined Senators KENNEDY, WEICKER, and several other of our colleagues in introducing S. 635, the Anti-Apartheid Act of 1985. We had extensive hearings on that bill in the Banking Committee—but he Senate never had a chance to vote on it. Instead on July 11, 1985, the Senate passed S. 995, a bill that was reported out by the Foreign Relations Committee, by a vote of 80 to 12. Although I think the Senate bill made a good start in demonstrating American opposition to apartheid—I favored the bill passed by the House on June 5 by a vote of 295 to 127.

I hope the few Senators who oppose this legislation will let us vote on it today and send it to the President prior to our August recess. It is important to do so.

The French Government reacted swiftly to the recent escalation of violence in South Africa by barring new investment there by French firms. The U.N. Security Council last Friday also condemned the situation in South Africa and recent actions by that Government. The United States must also act at this crucial time. The administration will not move—it is paralyzed and clings tenaciously to its discredited policy of constructive engagement. By agreeing on a bill today the Congress, at least, will send a clear message to the South African Government that it must move beyond a policy of maintaining order through an armed repression of dissent. The Government must begin a dialog with black leaders about how to carry out nonviolent change and an eventual end to apartheid. Bishop Tutu and other black leaders have made it clear they are eager to begin such talks.

Americans have always understood that governments must, if they are to have legitimacy, obtain their power from the consent of the governed. I am afraid that until South Africa has a government that is based on the consent of all its people, and not just the small proportion of the population that is white, there will be serious and tragic trouble in that land. It is in America's interest to encourage nonviolent reform in that country and that is the purpose of the legislation being considered by us today. Let us move to pass this legislation without further delay. Let us put a clear statement of U.S. policy on the books. I do not exaggerate when I say the world is watching what we do here today.

● Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, I support these very limited sanctions on South Africa. I do so not for the impact it will have on the Government of South Africa in changing its repugnant white supremacy policy of apartheid, for it will have little. I do so as a means of registering collective protest against legally sanctioned racism.

The history of sanctions is one of noble purpose and flawed results. For example, sanctions were attempted against Mussolini in response to his invasion of Ethiopia and in the Spanish Civil War, both in the 1930's, and they failed. Responding to Poland's declaration of martial law in 1981, the United States imposed economic sanctions on both Poland and the U.S.S.R. They had no discernible effect.

Effective sanctions against South Africa would require the rigorous and scrupulous participation of dozens of nations. Even assuming the fullest cooperation of France, which recently announced economic sanctions, the very limited U.S. sanctions called for in this bill will have only a miniscule impact, if any at all, on the industrial and commercial life in South Africa.

Thus, our vote on this bill is, in all candor, a symbolic one. It is a message from the American Government that declares South Africa's policy of apartheid and its various schemes of enforcing that policy, including the current "state of emergency" martial law, to be abhorrent.

In so condemning South Africa, we must be mindful of our own history of legally sanctioned racism.

We must remember that our Government was founded with slavery written into the Constitution. Heroic men of good will—Washington, Jefferson, and Madison—knew slavery to be a vicious evil yet, slaveowners themselves, were politically helpless in removing it from our midst. Thus, an abomination was sanctioned in our Constitution.

Our Nation fought a bloody Civil War over slavery. In the war's aftermath, we thought we had excised it's presence from our society with three constitutional amendments.

The 13th—which abolished slavery.

The 14th—which guarantees to all persons "equal protection of the laws."

The 15th—which guarantees all citizens the right to vote regardless of "race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

Yet for close to 100 years after these amendments were adopted, America ignored their meaning and practiced a policy of white supremacy sanctioned by the Supreme Court itself in a noxious constitutional doctrine of "separate but equal rights." American blacks were in every respect second-class citizens. Not until 1954 did the Supreme Court fully abandon this doctrine in Brown versus Board of Education.

Even today, the legacy of slavery and "separate but equal" haunts us in terms of de facto segregated education and housing and black economic deprivation. Only last night CBS carried a story on Tunica County, the poorest county in Mississippi. Pictured in the story was a cluster of impoverished blacks living in roach-infested clapboard houses bordering an open stream of human excrement. When CBS began its examination of conditions in Tunica, the white officials in charge decided it was time to begin improving conditions in this area. One black interviewed on camera said, "It's still slavery. Now the chains are invisible, but it's still slavery."

Both America's segregated past and its remnants of economic inequality make us ill at ease when dealing with another nation's racial policies.

Do not misunderstand me. I am not comparing anything in 1985 America with 1985 South Africa. In terms of personal cruelty and crass inhumanity to mankind, 1985 South Africa tops the so-called free world in the indecency of its official policy.

That is why we wish to our very core that we could influence great change there.

But I fear we cannot.

There are certain conditions in certain places in the world where the dynamics of the situation are such that even a well-intentioned superpower is virtually powerless to bring about a solution. Northern Ireland is one. Lebanon, we have found in terms of the spilling of our own blood, is another. South Africa is a third.

Twenty-two million blacks, 70 percent of the population in South Africa, want to exercise the basic political and personal freedoms of mankind; 5.5 million whites, 18 percent of the population, want to continue the dominance that has been theirs for 200 years. South Africa's Government pays lipservice to the goal of ending apartheid, but its glacial pace ensures revolution.

The present crisis in which 25 blacks have been killed and 1,259 blacks have been jailed for political activity may abate. The "state of emergency" may be lifted. After all, it was 25 years between Sharpeville and today. Without meaningful progress toward ending apartheid, the manifest inhumanity will remain to fester; the seeds of explosion will remain to be nurtured.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I rise to commend my conference committee chairman, the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. LUGAR], on the compromise reached with the House regarding the Anti-Apartheid Act of 1985.

It is a settlement that I fully endorse. It clearly demonstrates our Nation's abhorrence of apartheid, with sanctions that are far more than merely symbolic. Yet, very importantly, the compromise bill also permits our continued presence in South Africa, as long as that presence is tied to the commitment to work against apartheid and for reform from the South African Government. U.S. companies that choose to remain in South Africa would be bound to subscribe to and follow the precepts of the Sullivan principles of fair play and nondiscriminatory employment. Thus, the final compromise package combines both the carrot of continued investment along with the stick of sanctions that I believe are necessary if the dismantling of apartheid is to become a reality.

Mr. President, I endorse the conclusion of the conference that the United States can best contribute to the ending of apartheid if it retains a physical presence in South Africa, and if such a physical presence is a force for economic and political change. While a "no new investment" section—which amounts to phased-in disinvestment—would have greater initial impact, once implemented its leverage is gone. An ongoing U.S. business presence in South Africa, actively lobbying for political change and creating economic and social change by force of example, in my judgment, is a more powerful tactic over the long term, and this is clearly a long-term battle. In that regard, the Sullivan principles have made a significant contribution toward bettering the lives of black and other nonwhite workers in South Africa. They have made the U.S. companies subscribing to them become a positive force in that troubled land, a symbol and a model of fairness and equity in economic and social relations between businesses and their nonwhite workers. But those principles—and foreign company adherence to them—needs to be strengthened.

The conference compromise is a good bill, and it provides a number of significant sanctions on the Government of South Africa. However, if there were not such strong reasons for avoiding a long and decisive battle over amendments earlier on the Senate floor, I would have favored a number of amendments to strengthen the sanctions contained in the bill. Most importantly, I would have favored an import sanction for foreign companies that failed to subscribe to the Sullivan principles or a similarly stringent code. That is a provision which very well may become relevant and necessary in the future if the Europeans and Japanese adopt policies that undercut the mandatory Sullivan principles mandated in this bill.

The terrible events of the past 6 months in South Africa have been the catalyst for this package. But, sanctions against South Africa were inevitable, given the moral repugnance of the system of apartheid.

I have come to the conclusion that it is time for the U.S. Government to move decisively away from the policy of "constructive engagement," in which our American patience was mistaken by the Government in Pretoria as an indication of acquiescence—or even approval—of the policy of apartheid. The passage of this bill should be seen as a death knell for that policy and a very significant symbolic gesture, one which begins the process of disassociation of the United States from the oppressor in South Africa and places our Nation in support of the oppressed.

Mr. President, there will be those who will say that this bill contains some awfully strong medicine, and that such remedies should be used only in extreme situations. My response to them would be that the disease of apartheid is so debilitating to the nonwhite citizens of South Africa that only strong remedies are likely to work. Let us not forget that South Africa is the only nation in the world where legalized and institutionalized racism is a cornerstone of public policy. This means that nonwhites are denied the fundamental right of citizenship which underpins civil rights and political liberties throughout the West. From that premise follows the absence of property rights, the pass laws restricting movement within the country, and all the other hated laws and regulations that implement apartheid. The homelands—or Bantustans—policy is but the most recent manifestation of a system that is based on the proposition that more than 80 percent of South Africa's population are nonpersons, completely at the mercy and whim of the Central Government.

Mr. President, the South African Government would most likely respond to my points about the lack of civil rights and liberties by saying that favorable economic opportunities for blacks in South Africa offset whatever political privation they may suffer. But are conditions really good for blacks there? In black areas infant mortality is 15 times that of whites. One out of two children die before the age of 5. Half the children under 10 suffer from malnutrition. All this is occurring in one of the most advanced technological societies in the industrialized world, not in the poorest of the poor less developed countries where one would expect such statistics. These tragic numbers are a logical result of the public policy pursued by the Government of South Africa.

The shame, Mr. President, is that it took the deaths of hundreds of blacks and the declaration of a state of emergency—in effect the terrible happenings of the past few months—to induce action. If only we had made it clear to the South African Government that if it continued to violate basic human rights we would begin to sever our economic ties, then perhaps things might not be as bad as they are now. The Export Administration Act of 1984, which I played a major role in drafting and managing, contained a number of the sanctions contained in the bill before us. Unfortunately, the House and Senate failed in their attempts at compromise. I am pleased, however, that important elements of that bill were incorporated into this package, particularly the ban on bank loans to the South African Government and the compulsory Sullivan principles. I am also pleased that the conferees agreed to a ban on the further importation of Krugerrands, a provision which I strongly supported in conference.

Mr. President, the greater the support for this bill the less the chance there will be a Presidential veto. I say to my colleagues, those of you who have reservations about the effectiveness of this bill, consider the strong possibility of other countries following our lead and example. In view of France's decision to impose sanctions and the EEC's resolution to call back their ambassadors for consultation, a continuing snowball effect is not at all unlikely. I call on you to join with me in strongly endorsing this bill and to send a message to South African and to the world that the days of apartheid are numbered.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, on July 11, 1985, the Senate took what I view as inappropriate and thoroughly irresponsible action by passing the South Africa sanctions bill. Though the bill is intended to hasten the demise of apartheid, its effect will be to harm the very people it claims to help. Yesterday, the conference committee resolved the differences between the two bills, and wound up with legislation that is more punitive than the Senate bill.

This is the wrong approach to ending apartheid, and I reject the contention of some Members who are trying to legitimize their actions against South Africa by saying blacks are willing to suffer and lose their jobs for freedom. I do not deny that blacks want freedom, as they deserve, but I doubt very much that they want their homes destroyed, their lives threatened, or their country destroyed by radicals who do not want reform but want revolution and power. If it is true that House Members supporting sanctions are acting in the blacks' best interest, then why did the House of Representatives overwhelmingly reject a proposal to poll South African blacks about their feelings about disinvestment? Could it be that the majority in the House are not actually concerned with what blacks in South Africa want America to do to help them?

I would like to ask my colleagues who support these sanctions if they have ever heard of the Schlemmer poll, which proved that 75 percent of South African blacks oppose disinvestment. Some have questioned the methodology of that study, but it was above reproach. Some said that blacks are afraid to say what they really think about disinvestment, but the poll was conducted with blacks interviewing blacks. So all these arguments when brought to light fall flat on their face, and the glaring truth is that Washington politicians are only pandering to the national news media, which is driving this issue. They show no concern for the welfare or the wishes of the blacks in South Africa.

There is still considerable debate in the international community regarding the best way to eliminate apartheid. Recently, my colleague from Massachusetts remarked approvingly on France's imposition of sanctions. But he failed to mention Great Britain's position toward South Africa, which I feel is both humane and moral, unlike the French position. Last Tuesday, British Foreign Secretary Sir Geoffrey Howe said that South Africa's policy of apartheid is "abhorrent in moral and social terms" but that his Government is still "firmly opposed to economic sanctions of any kind." Howe repeated his Government's official position saying, "The effects of economic measures would of course be felt most keenly by black South Africans."

While man's inhumanity to man is always abhorrent, ignoring it is a far greater offense. Unfortunately, injustice to blacks only draws attention and press coverage when the injustice is caused by whites. Time and again black crimes against blacks go unreported, while white crimes against blacks are front-page news. My question to my colleagues who support sanctions against South Africa, but ignore the greater abuses in other African nations or in Communist countries is—"Are we really not being racist ourselves by concerning ourselves solely with white injustice against blacks?"

Currently, the South African Government has been forced to invoke emergency powers in an attempt to control the enormous amount of especially vicious violence, much of which is blacks killing other blacks who are viewed as collaborators, and mob attacks against policeman, many of whom are black, forcing them to respond in self-defense. In other words, while the Government of South Africa is criticized for detaining persons without due process, there are blacks in South Africa being slaughtered by other blacks without proof of guilt, and without trial.

Desmond Tutu himself is speaking out vigorously against this black violence, and pleads that he will be forced to leave his beloved South Africa if these savageries do not end. Nightmarish events, such as the one about a black woman being axed to death, and her body burned by a black mob because she had allegedly violated the boycott against white-owned stores are becoming commonplace. The networks have shown film footage from South Africa—from Duduza, of another young black woman, accused of being a police informer, who was stoned and set on fire by a black mob. As the woman in agony tried to rise from her knees, her body ablaze, a bystander kicked her viciously in the head. Clearly, the ends do not justify the means; this type of hideous behavior makes one question the ugly influences in the antiapartheid movement, and as Tutu himself said, "whether South Africa's blacks are ready for freedom."

Let me quote from Oliver Tambo, the head of the Soviet-controlled African National Congress. Tambo declared, after the first executive gathering of the ANC since 1969 in Zambia, that an intensified war would make it difficult "to distinguish between soft and hard targets." A Radio Freedom ANC broadcast from Marxist Ethiopia vowed that black killings in South Africa would be on the increase, and that the ANC would target so-called "collaborators," that is, anyone suspected of trying to work solutions out peaceably with the Government, of those living in the homelands, and of the colored and Indian members of the tricameral Parliament. Let me read from a Foreign Broadcast Information Service release from July 23 of this year, an interview from London's The Guardian with an ANC official.

This official, Joe Slovo, who calls himself chief military planner for the African National Congress, states that the ANC's highest priority is to "build up and expand its underground cells." He remarks on the growth of internal leadership, and the appearance of the United Democratic Front. The South African Government has been criticized for linking the UDF with the ANC. However, this ANC official acknowledges that "many UDF leaders are veterans of the ANC."

Slovo comments on the growth of the trade unions, and says that the fact that there are more blacks in unions than whites "creates the possibility of making the economy unworkable as well as the country ungovernable." So this is the ultimate objective, Mr. President, to make South Africa ungovernable. Do my colleagues know that the ANC, which has been exposed as being a puppet organization of the South African Communist Party, is in favor of the exact type of sanctions legislation that this Congress seems to be supporting?

Joe Slovo, who gave this interview, is a veteran member of the South African Communist Party. And the Communists' war against South Africa is on the increase. Slovo claims that the line between civilian and military targets is "becoming thinner and thinner." The ANC is asking black policemen to turn their guns on their masters. The interview notes the new development of death squads, which have been responsible for killing 11 people and abducting 25 black activists.

My colleagues should read the remarks of these ANC officials, and rethink their position on this issue. Some of the biggest promoters of sanctions in the Senate are the same ones that display horror at "right-wing death-squads" operating in El Salvador. They don't seem nearly as concerned about Communist death squads operating in South Africa. In fact, the do not speak at all about Communist hit teams seeking to undermine the strongest American ally in Africa. It would be hard to explain to constituents I guess that one supports punitive measures against an ally that will weaken its economic position, and therefore open it up to a more volatile internal situation, and yet oppose taking strong measures against countries that are our declared enemies, because we have to keep a "dialog" going with them. This type of attitude is reprehensible, Mr. President.

I repeat, the goal of this ANC terrorism, which has already claimed so many civilian lives, is to make South Africa ungovernable. I find it astonishing that some of the biggest critics of South Africa are the same people who believe U.S. support for freedom fighters in Nicaragua is state terrorism. Curiously, that is Moscow's line too. And of course, Trans-Africa, which has promoted the "Free South Africa" movement, believes the United States should provide aid to the ANC and SWAPO, both pro-Soviet terrorist groups, because the United States, according to Robinson, provides "arms to all of the right-wing heinous regimes around the world." Naturally, Robinson believes the ANC and SWAPO are liberation movements. How well I remember how other Marxist liberation groups freed countries like Vietnam, North Korea, Cuba, and Nicaragua. Too bad the free world media cannot concern itself with the plight of those in the Marxist-dominated states, because those governments no longer allow foreign media inside, nor is native free press tolerated.

On the PBS program, Capitol Journal last Friday, Robinson was quoted as saying South Africa is "the most vicious regime on Earth." It defies explanation that Robinson can justify that comment when Desmond Tutu can fly freely around the world criticizing the Government, and return home without fear of reprisal. Meanwhile Andrei Sakharov is confined in the bowels of the Soviet Union, his whereabouts unknown, and Lech Walesa is forbidden to travel outside

51-059 O-86-29 (Pt. 16)

Poland—and sometimes inside Poland too. But no protestors appear in an orchestrated campaign before the embassies of these Communist governments, the most oppressive system of government the world has ever seen. How can Randall Robinson single out South Africa's political system for criticism when in Liberia whites can neither vote nor own property? Is black-imposed apartheid less objectionable than white-imposed apartheid? As to justice, one particularly enlightened practice in Liberia applied to suspected criminals is to pour a toxic potion called sassywood down their throats. If they regurgitate the substance, they're considered innocent, and if they retain it, they are guilty. This practice is referred to somewhat clinically in the "1984 State Department Country Reports" as "trial by ordeal."

The press vilifies the South African Government for invoking emergency powers even though designed to put an end to the violence, to the lynchings, and to prevent mobs' taking the law into their own hands. How can the South African Government restore an environment in which blacks feel safe in dealing with white political leaders in renewing the political dialogue, when many local black leaders are resigning their positions in the community for fear of assassination?

Also, there is literally no condemnation, either officially or in the press, of the atrocities committed by Robert Mugabe's Marxist regime against other blacks. Again, is apartheid more press-worthy than the genocidal campaign against the Ndebele Tribe by Mugabe's death squads? Where is the concern for minority rights in Zimbabwe? Or is it tolerated because the liberals feel uncomfortable in pressuring a black dictator to behave in a civilized fashion? How many of us are aware that Mugabe has had an emergency decree in place, and has recently extended it for another 6 months? Unlike President Botha who is anxious to renew a political dialog with black leaders, Mugabe has called his rapidly diminishing political opposition "malcontents" and said bluntly that they can leave Zimbabwe if they don't like his rule. Where is the national outcry over this dictatorial behavior—where is the media outrage—or are all the news cameras fixated only on South Africa?

Mr. President, this is only the tip of a very large iceberg of African violence. To futher my point, I would ask unanimous consent that an article that appeared in the Wall Street Journal on Monday, July 22, 1985 be printed in the RECORD. This article was written by Mr. George B.N. Ayittey, who is a native of Ghana and an assistant professor of economics at Bloomsburg University in Pennsylvania. Mr. Ayittey argues eloquently the hypocrisy of the U.S. fixation on South African apartheid, and the ignoring of gross atrocities of the rest of the continent.

I would also like to include in the RECORD an excellent piece by a member of the opposition party in South Africa, which appeared in last Wednesday's Washington Post. I commend Helen Suzman for her clarity of vision in suggesting how the United States can constructively enhance political rights in South Africa.

I also ask unanimous consent that other articles on this subject be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, July 24, 1985]

SOUTH AFRICA: WHAT THE WEST CAN DO

(By Helen Suzman)

What can be done by the West to speed up the dismantling of apartheid? Many options are under consideration, with disinvestment and sanctions much to the fore. If I thought these would work, they would have my unconditional support.

Not only do I not believe these campaigns would be effective I also believe they would be counter-productive.

I respect the moral motivation for disinvestment and sanctions. But, once gone from the South African scene, any good that may have resulted from American or European codes of employment conduct, for companies with interests in South Africa, will go by the board.

The Sullivan and European Community codes have certainly made businessmen more conscious of their social responsibilities, and have led to improvements in employment practices and also to assistance in education and housing.

More recently—perhaps because of the threat of disinvestment—organized business in South Africa has expressed its objections to the detention of trade unionists and is pressing for the repeal of influx control.

The vacuum left by the withdrawal of U.S. and European firms will be filled, if at all, by companies with less interest in the welfare of their black employees.

Moreover, if it is fondly imagined that the South African government will buckle under such pressures and abandon apartheid faster than it intends, this illusion should be immediately dispelled. Far more likely, far more in keeping with the temperament of the government and of the majority of the white inhabitants, would be the development of a siege mentality.

Nor should the idea be seriously entertained that economic hardship would lead to a successful black revolution, followed by a black majority socialist government to replace the white capitalist regime. It just is not on, as anyone acquainted with the ferocity and determination of the South African army and police will agree. Nor is there any guarantee that the replacement would be any better or more democratic than the present regime, should a revolution succeed.

That disinvestment, lack of foreign capital and imposition of sanctions would be effective as a punitive measure is undeniable. But it would not be selective of its victims.

Although the white South Africans would be affected, the major sufferers would be black—South African blacks and also blacks from neighboring states heavily dependent on South Africa for financial aid, grants, markets and jobs.

"Blacks don't care if there is mass unemployment," people say. I am on the receiving end of many requests from recent job losers for assistance in obtaining jobs, and I say that blacks who don't care are those whose jobs are not endangered or who have never had a job to loose.

My main opposition to any steps that inhibit economic expansion is that such action blunts the only weapon that blacks have or are in the process of acquiring—the economic muscle that accompanies upward mobility on the economic ladder by virtue of greater skills and increased consumer power. Too slowly, but nevertheless surely, blacks are obtaining the leverage with which to demand redress in the imbalances in power and wealth and privilege in South Africa.

It is totally counterproductive to put obstacles in the way of the economic forces that so far have led to changes that are more than cosmetic—trade unionism, skilled job opportunities, urbanization.

And it is counterproductive to drive whites, who are in growing numbers increasingly disillusioned with apartheid and who have begun to accept power-sharing, back into the laager.

I have to admit I resent the way in which people living many thousands of miles away from South Africa totally ignore the hundreds of thousands of white South Africans who abhor race discrimination and who have been fighting apartheid for years.

My party, with its policy of a no statutory discrimination and full adult suffrage with no domination, obtained 20 percent of the votes of the white electorate at the last election. We will do better next time, but not if the country is under grave economic stress. Liberalizing forces are not strengthened in such circumstances.

What can or should the West do to help bring apartheid to an end without causing chaos in South Africa? There are limits to what can be done from outside, if peaceful reform is the objective.

Most helpful would be for Western interests to stay in South Africa and use their influence with the government and white South Africans. Contact, not isolation, is needed. In one area only—sport—has isolation been successful in helping to break down segregation. It worked because of South Africa's longing to get back into international sport, but also because desegregation in sport did not affect the power structure. That there have been no rewards forthcoming in sport, I might add, is not conducive to South Africans making other changes.

U.S. and European firms should accelerate their efforts to uplift black participation in the South African economy. The latest reports on the implementation of the codes should have penalties imposed on them. The United States is considering making the Sullivan code compulsory for American firms in South Africa. I appreciate the problems in monitoring, but there have been positive results from the codes, and this should be considered.

The West should raise its voice long and loud against apartheid in general, and in particular against any outrageous actions by the South African government. Never mind about "double standards": South Africa claims Western values and must be judged as such.

I have no doubt that protest by Western envoys helped to un-ban people such as Beyers Naude and was instrumental in freezing forced removals as at Crossroads. The South African government is more sensitive than one thinks. It does not enjoy being a pariah. It would like to be welcomed back into the Western community of nations.

But not at any cost. Rather should you aim at attainable objectives than adopt measures that could reduce the country to economic chaos, with totally unpredictable consequences.

SHARE THE POWER

(By William Raspberry)

The South African government is once again a day late and a concession short in its drive to forestall the inevitable. Conciliatory words that would have signaled a breakthrough a few years ago come across now as empty justification for the armed repression of the country's black majority.

The repression itself (invoked under emergency powers so sweeping that the press is forbidden even to print the names of those arrested and jailed) might have worked a few years ago to produce at least an uneasy calm. Now it serves only to radicalize the black population, threatening to turn what the government calls "riots" into what it fears most; full-fledged revolution.

The time-tested way of dealing with violent uprisings is to isolate the radical leadership while making serious concessions to the rank and file. South Africa is expert at isolating, incompetent at making concessions. Again and again, it makes concessions only after the thing conceded has ceased to hold even symbolic importance.

It concedes the permanency of its black urban population only after its "homelands" policy, under which, by definition, there would be no black South Africans, has been rejected by the entire world. It offers semicitizenship to its Asian and mixed-race population, hoping that the blacks will read that to mean "We must be next." With protest building both inside and outside the country, with police-provoked violence resulting in hundreds of deaths, with every funeral of every police victim threatening to launch the revolution, the government offers: what? A relaxation of the official ban on mixed marriages.

Now the offer is for negotiations between the government and the black leadership, negotiations with a view to power sharing. Listen to the government, and you get the impression that such negotiations are all it ever wanted, that the only reason for invoking the emergency powers now in force was to buy a period of peace during which the negotiations could move forward.

But first, you understand, the government must move to protect the blacks who are interested in negotiations from the black radicals bent on murdering them. The South African ambassador-designate Herbert Beukes sought to make that point on ABC-TV's "Nightime" the other night. Fortunately the Rev. Alan Boesak, one of the brightest new opposition leaders in the country, was also on that show to point out that the blacks being killed by blacks are not "moderates" and bridge-builders but men suspected of being collaborators, informants and quislings.

A DOUBLE STANDARD IN BLACK AND WHITE

(By George B.N. Ayittey)

Apartheid is an abomination. But the sad fact is that many of the black African leaders who applaud sanctions on South Africa have themselves instituted de facto "apartheid" regimes in their own countries against their own black people.

The first characteristic of apartheid is its caste system: separation of people on the basis of race. White South Africans, who control the government, have refused to share meaningful power with the disenfranchised black majority. The standards of living of the whites are far higher than those of the blacks. The second feature is a dual system of justice: a relatively lenient one for whites but a swift and brutal one for blacks. The third is an intolerance of any opposition—the death of Steve Biko and the imprisonment of Nelson Mandela are well-known. The fourth is insidious repression of the black majority in general through such devices as the pass laws.

Now, if one looks beyond the issue of skin color, similar characteristics also can be found in many black African regimes.

Negotiations, in fact, may be the way out of the turmoil and injustice in South Africa. The ruling whites cannot be expected to concede voluntarily any principle approximating one man-one vote. But just as blacks in charge of what was then Rhodesia were willing to negotiate a reserve of political power to the white minority, so might the whites in charge of South Africa see the wisdom of negotiating a settlement with the black majority.

The prospects for such a negotiated outcome increase with every acknowledgment, implicit or otherwise, from the ruling white minority that the present situation is untenable, politically, militarily and morally.

The danger is that the government, once again being too clever for its own good, will try to negotiate with its own handpicked "trusties," rendering any agreement worse than useless.

The government knows which black leaders have the confidence of the majority of black South Africans—men such as Nelson Mandela and Walter Sisulu, imprisoned since the early 1960s, or Nobelist Desmond Tutu, who may be in prison before the current unrest is over.

If South Africa's whites really are ready for peaceful change (as opposed to buying time to retain their absolute power) they know how to do it. The fear is that they will, as has become their sorry custom, do too little too late.

ONE-MAN, NO-VOTE

In black Africa, the two classes are not whites vs. blacks but rather the elites (the educated class and the military) vs. the people (the peasants). The elite minority, which controls the government, does not share power with the people. As in South Africa, the elite minority disenfranchises the peasant majority. Until 1984, the peasants of Liberia could not vote in a presidential election unless they had property valued at more than $25,000.

Indeed, some African leaders who advocate majority rule and one-man-one-vote for south Africa do not give their own black people the right to vote. Many have declared themselves "Presidents for Life." Other black regimes are military dictatorships or farcical "democracies."

The standards of living enjoyed by the elites far outstrip those for the peasants. Contrast the plush and subsidized amenities for the ruling class in the urban areas with the dingy and wretched lives of rural peasants. In Mauritania, while the elites have access to subsidized tap-water supplies, the peasants pay seven to 40 times more for their water from sellers with donkey carts. In Zaire, officials each earn between $5,000 and $9,000 a month while a peasant is lucky to make $50 a month. Cameroon, with a per-capita income of less than $1,000 a year, is the world's ninth-largest importer of champagne.

The prices at which the rural poor sell their produce are dictated, not by market forces, but by government directives. They face stiff penalties and outright confiscation of their produce if they sell above the dictated prices. In Ghana, farmers receive less than 10% of the world market price for their cocoa. In Gambia, they receive less than 20% of the world market price for their peanuts.

In many African countries, when peasants run afoul of the law, justice is swift and brutal. Consider two cases:

In September 1981, a 43-year-old peasant woman, Kporkporvie Dada, was beaten to death by Ghanaian border guards for taking a gallon of kerosene across a border to a relative.

Phillipine Addo, a 27-year-old peasant who in 1982 attempted to smuggle $3 worth of cocoa into Togo, was jailed for five years at hard labor.

The ruling elites also smuggle, embezzle funds, plunder state treasuries and illegally transfer their booty abroad. If corrupt ministers are apprehended, the sentences tend to be light or nonexistent: forfeiture of the booty or mere dismissals or transfers. Some examples:

In Upper Volta (now Burkina Faso), at corruption trials in 1984, former President Sangoule Lamizana who could not account for about $1 million he was charged with embezzling, was acquitted. Three top officials of his government were ordered only to repay to the state money they had allegedly stolen while in office.

Three top officials of the Ghana Meat Marketing Board were merely sacked in 1984 for "gross abuse of office."

In Gambia, the attorney general, M. Fafa M'Bai, set up an Asset Evaluation Commission in 1984 to probe illicit enrichment. While the commission was sending questionnaries to 16 Gambians to explain their riches, Mr. M'Bai was illegally transferring about $180,000 to Standard Charted Bank of London. He resigned and then sought an injunction to debar the commission from probing his assets. The Gambian Supreme Court granted that injunction!

South African crackdowns on the African National Congress can be compared with those meted out to opposition elements in black Africa; many leaders have either outlawed political parties or have declared their countries one-party states and liquidated the opposition. Many opposition members have mysteriously vanished in Zaire, Kenya, Uganda, Zambia and Guinea.

There are also parallels between apartheid and black African regimes in the control of their populations. For example, black South Africans must carry passes that allow them only into certain areas; in black Africa peasants must contend with curfews and roadblocks. Only members of the ruling class have the passes or permits to sail through road barriers and break curfew hours. For the majority of others, harassment is the norm. Policemen have deliberately set their watches ahead in order to harass and extort money from "curfew breakers." Peasants in Ghana could not legally cross regional borders until restrictions were lifted last year by the military government of Flight Lt. Jerry J. Rawlings. (Some economic reforms demanded by the International Monetary Fund have also been implemented by Mr. Rawlings, but he shows no signs of allowing political freedoms.)

Despite the parallels, world opinion tends to apply radically different standards of morality to South Africa and black Africa. If South Africa had savagely expelled its illegal black aliens, as Nigeria recently did; or if South Africa had resettled some blacks on "homelands" in the midst of a famine, as Ethiopia recently attempted, condemnations at the United Nations and in Congress would have been deafening. As if the skin color or the ideology of the tyrant makes any difference to the oppressed. Does one see demonstrations in front of culpable black African embassies in Washington or calls for sanctions against any black African countries? There are 16 million oppressed blacks in South Africa. But some 400 million people live elsewhere in black Africa, a majority under despotic rule. Why is so little attention given to their plight?

The U.N. does not condemn despotism in black Africa for fear of 'interfering in the domestic affairs of sovereign nations." South Africa is not a sovereign nation, it might be argued—its government is illegitimate and unrepresentative of its people. But what black African government is legitimate and representative? Virulent condemnation of apartheid without parallel denunciations of tyranny in black African countries only serves to perpetuate the myth of black inferiority. Applying a lower standard of morality to black Africa betrays an insulting double standard against blacks.

REBUTTING RACISM

Some of the remaining support for apartheid may be caused by conditions in black Africa itself. When South Africans look across their border they see the same atrocities the black African governments accuse them of committing. Furthermore, these governments have, through misguided policies, reduced their economies to tatters. Ian Smith, the former white prime minister of Rhodesia, defended his refusal to hand over power to the majority by observing that black Africans were incapable of running a country and managing an economy. That statement was rightly denounced as racist and invalid, but black Africa's execrable economic record is not a convincing rebuttal.

To the majority of black Africans, the peasants, the whole apartheid issue is largely irrelevant. Many of them would affirm that they fared better economically under the white colonialists. To many, independence has meant oppression and economic deprivation. Indeed, back in 1981, many peasants in Ghana were calling upon the British to recolonize the country. If we had to die, I and many oppressed Africans would rather be shot dead in South Africa than in an independent African nation under black rule. It seems that only in South Africa does the killing and subjugation of innocent blacks prompt world-wide pressure for reform.

[From the Washington Times, July 29, 1985]

IN SOUTH AFRICA, SOVIETS TURN INVISIBLE SCREWS

The "winds of change" that drove the colonial powers—Belgium, France, Britain and Portugal—from the African continent brought great hopes for democracy and economic development. More than a quarter century has passed since the wave of independence began. The shining hope has been supplanted by dictatorship, repression, brutality, venality, starvation and despair now commonplace throughout the continent. The exception has been South Africa, long an enclave of prosperity and order.

Over the years, most recently in conversations with President Pieter W. Botha, I learned of the constructive changes and steady progress taking place in South Africa that would lead to the dismantling of the abhorrent apartheid system not by violent revolution and race war, but by a reasoned process. Mr. Botha spoke to me of the tremendous political risks he was taking to bring about constitutional and other internal reforms. He said, "We can see all of black Africa slowly dying, and we have no intention of abandoning our country to the same fate."

What South Africans once found unimaginable may now become a reality.

How curious it is to find the United States government expressing its "revulsion" at the South African state of emergency declared by the Pretoria government to put down a wave of terrorism in which an estimated 450 black South Africans have been the victims of systematic atrocities perpetrated by revolutionaries who also happen to be black. Would our State Department officials rather than South Africa decide that the lives and property of black people should not enjoy the protection of the law?

Ironically, the wave of violence washing over South Africa's urban black townships, bringing death to scores of black people at the hands of the revolutionary terrorists of the African National Congress, was generated in large part by the Nkomati accord, signed on March 16 last year between Mozambique and South Africa.

The crucial provision of Nkomati required Samora Machel, the Marxist leader of Mozambique, to close down the bases and facilitied enjoyed by the African National Congress (ANC). This revolutionary movement has long been supported by the Soviet Union and has been under the political domination of the South African Communist Party for the past four decades. Mozambique had allowed ANC to use its territory to establish camps from which terrorist teams were infiltrated into South Africa. Mr. Machel immediately fulfilled his Nkomati pledge. The ANC's terror cadre was sent packing (to Zambia, Tanzania and Angola), and key personnel in the ANC political and terrorist command structure were expelled. ANC's terrorist operations were disrupted, and South Africa maintained the pressure by raiding ANC camps harbored by other neighboring countries.

President Botha's government has high expectations that Nkomati would signal the end of ANC as a terrorist problelm. Then they could divert much of their defense budget into expanding their economy, and resume the ponderous pace of the progressive integration of black, Asian and mixed-race South Africans into the country's economic and political system. This is the key point: To bring black South Africans into the political system would be to destroy the whole system of apartheid with its restrictions on areas of residence and property ownership.

Pretoria made this assumption, however, without considering that the only option left to the ANC, other than admission of defeat, was to mobilize their supporters inside South Africa, particularly in some of the black trade unions and in the United Democratic Front (UDF) coalition. Furthermore, for non-white South Africans, a climate of rising expectations had been created that encouraged militancy and pressure tactics to accelerate the sluggish pace of change. The dropping of a number of restrictive racial laws and the first officially sanctioned cracks in political segregation have contributed to that feeling of expectation, as has the fact that wages in South Africa are well above the African norm. Wages may be low compared with those in the United States, but they are so far above the norm for Africa that tens of thousands of blacks voluntarily leave their black-ruled bordering countries to take jobs in South Africa in spite of the inane, degrading humiliations of apartheid regulations.

ANC's regrouping after the Nkomati reverse was speedy. Last summer the ANC leadership held lengthy consultations with leading American anti-South Africa activists at the United Nations, then immediately went to havana to work out details on creating external diplomatic pressure against South Africa in the United States and Western Europe, in which U.N. agencies would play a supporting role. By last October, the plans were ready for implementation. The opening round in "making South Africa ungovernable" commenced with illegal strikes by black trade unions. Some of the leaders were arrested, and those arrests were the focus of protests in Europe and America in the first two weeks of November.

On Thanksgiving, the campaign of American protests and sit-ins against South Africa moved into high gear. The U.S. protest coalition, known as the Free South Africa Movement (FSAM), is spearheaded by Randall Robinson's Trans Africa, a lobbying organization. They have made clear their commitment to the ANC and to other revolutionary movements and regimes sponsored by Moscow in Africa and the Caribbean.

Since then, Mr. Robinson has given the national media a daily, carefully orchestrated "story." He has de facto "proprietary rights" over protest at the South African Embassy. Two or three prominent people are lined up in advance to get arrested, which is a perfectly convenient thing to do since the U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia has refused to prosecute anyone demonstrating at the South African Embassy, while vigorously prosecuting those who protest at the Soviet Union's Embassy. A press conference is held at which the prominent people make statements, and then a group of demonstrators selected well in advance by TransAfrica goes to the embassy, where they demonstrate and are arrested.

Having learned from the civil rights and anti-Vietnam war protests, today's demonstrators are neatly dressed, orderly, polite—and in the long run as dangerous as the ANC-inspired mobs who have killed more than 450 black South Africans since the present terrorism campaign erupted. "On camera," the protestors are concerned, as indeed, most of us are, with human rights and the abuse of power. But the FSAM agenda aims at persuading the U.S. government to help economically isolate South Africa from the Free World and thus assist in overthrowing it and replacing it with a Soviet-dominated, pseudo-"nationalist" revolutionary regime. The polite dignitaries on the picket line, knowingly or unwittingly, are acting to transform South Africa into an Ethiopia, a Uganda, an Angola, A Tanzania or a Zimbabwe—a process in which democracy has meant one man, one vote, one time! And no less a personage than Richard Lugar, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, is lending himself, albeit unwittingly, to this demolition exercise.

That is the ultimate purpose of the economic warfare campaigns to end economic relations and isolate South Africa from the United States. TransAfrica's FSAM crusaders are not fazed by the fact that such economic measures would force America to depend on the Soviet Union as the sole alternative supplier of a variety of strategic minerals we now buy freely from South Africa. After all, TransAfrica consistently promoted the nasty little pro-Soviet regime on Grenada.

Does it matter particularly whether South Africa is ruled in five years time by a government allied with the Soviet Union? The answer is yes, because ultimately our continued freedom depends on it.

South Africa is essential to the strategic survival of the United States and Western Europe. That strategic importance is the result of her geology and geography; and it is not a fact that is going to change for many years. South Africa is the sole source in the non-Communist world of a multitude of rare minerals which are critical to the industrial and military strength of the West—among them chromium, platinum and vanadium. These and other rare metals form the exotic alloys that enable rockets and jet engines to withstand intense heat, and which strengthen submarine hulls against the enormous pressures of the deep oceans, and have many specialized functions in our high technology. There is one alternative source for those minerals—the Soviet Union.

Furthermore, geography has placed South Africa astride the shipping lanes traveled by the oil tankers carrying crude oil from the Persian Gulf across the Indian Ocean and around the Cape of Good Hope into the Atlantic. The government which rules South Africa can control the tanker traffic carrying the Gulf's petroleum to Western Europe, Latin America and the United States.

The leaders of the Soviet Union obviously are aware of this. In sum, the blunt fact remains that South Africa represents the jugular vein of the West, and that even if South Africa had no controversial and unpopular racial and ethnic regulations, that country would be a target of Soviet imperialism. The Kremlin would prefer to win world power without provoking us to resist. The name of the geopolitical game is, after all, as Sun Tsu told us 25 centuries ago, to subdue the armies of one's enemies without ever having to fight them. Therefore, they use what is called in Soviet jargon "active measures" that entail propaganda, subversion, agents of influence, disinformation and other techniques implemented primarily by the KGB in cooperation with all Soviet agencies and assets to bring about the gradual collapse of our will to resist.

In the case of South Africa, as with Vietnam 15 years ago, the multifaceted Soviet "active measures" campaign aims to persuade our leaders to forget that America's strategic viability will be at risk in South Africa for many decades—regardless of the political and racial complexion of its government.

Is there proof that the Soviets are engaging in "active measures" to promote an ANC rule over South Africa? Yes, in fact the only time in history that the Soviets ever publicly admitted that such "active measures" existed came in a statement to the U.N. General Assembly four years ago. The U.S.S.R. formally stated, "Efforts are under way in the Soviet Union to mobilize world opinion in the fight to eliminate colonialism, racism and apartheid in southern Africa. Active measures in this direction are being carried out." The Soviets even named some of the agencies implementing "active measures." They were the Soviet organizations run by the International Department of the Soviet Communist Party Central Committee in cooperation with the KGB that, in turn control the international fronts, among which are the World Peace Council (WPC), International Association of Democratic Lawyers (IADL), Women's International Democratic Federation (WIDF), and World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU).

However, most Western public officials, public opinion molders, and particularly Congress and the media are hesitant, if not unwilling, to acknowledge the fact that the Soviet Union is seeking directly and through local surrogates to detach South Africa from the West, deny the West access to its strategic minerals and, sooner or later, replace its government with a regime more to Moscow's liking. Some argue that "nationalists" will take over ANC and expel the Marxists; but to date, ANC's Marxists have regularly purged "nationalists" who chafed under their strict discipline.

The bottom line is that it is irrelevant whether anti-America "nationalists" or anti-American Marxists seize power in South Africa. The Soviets undoubtedly would perfer to see a Marxist-Leninist regime of the Angolan Ethiopian or Cuban model take over. For many years, Soviet policy in the Third World has been to support any movement or regime so long as it was anti-American. They recognize that an ultra-nationalist or extremist regime determinedly hostile to American interests—Khomeini's Iran being a prime example—would serve Moscow's interest nearly as well in placing control of U.S. access to strategic minerals in hostile hands.

Without South Africa's minerals, America's high-technology defense industries would have to depend on the Soviets for those rare strategic minerals. If America did not buy minerals from South Africa, what price do you think the Soviets would set?

There is also a moral irony in this. Year by year over the past decade and more, as the urban black population has increased and skilled, educated black people play an expanding role in the modern urban economy, South Africa has been dropping racially restrictive laws and now is committed to opening the political power structure. On the other hand, Soviet gold, as Alexander Solzhenitsyn told us, is the product of the Soviet forced labor camps that constitute the Gulag Archipelago. Forced labor accounts for nearly all of Soviet mining operations. How the Soviet cynics must jeer to see America and Europe urging abandonment of trade with South Africa when their only alternative must be to line up at the Soviet trade counter and, therefore, to encourage the Soviets to expand their use of forced labor.

When the Politburo first considered how South Africa might be brought into the Communist camp back in Stalin's time, they used a classic tactic; develop a well-organized Communist Party and Communist underground; then penetrate and take over the African National Congress (ANC); organize a "popular front"; use terror to dispose of political opponents, demoralize the population, bring them under control and escalate into mass confrontational protests in order to elicit a stern reaction on the part of the government and police; then use that as the "justification" for a move into terrorist "armed struggle."

But in more recent years, in the Third World, the Soviets have recognized that it is sufficient that a government merely be anti-American for Soviet interests to be served. Of course the Soviets eventually would like to see traditional Marxist-Leninist parties ruling the countries of the Third World. But they realize that revolution by stages is less likely to alarm Western governments, thus they can avoid armed confrontations. After all, is the loss of one more slice of salami worth fighting over? In this type of "cold" conflict, all the tactics short of armed confrontation—propaganda, "active measures," disinformation and deception—play a very important role in undermining America's will to act in defense of our national interest, and, in the case of South Africa, in persuading our government to isolate America from South Africa.

From secret information provided by a high-level Soviet official who has now defected to the West, it has been learned that Moscow's overall plan has four main points:

Consolidate Soviet influence in Angola, Mozambique and Zimbabwe; at the same time enhance the military capabilities of these countries to act as Soviet surrogates; and provide aid sufficient to reduce their economic dependence on South Africa;

Strengthen the underground organization of the African National Congress and its fronts inside South Africa;

Weaken the South African military capacity and will to resist;

Increase the international political and economic isolation of South Africa through an intensified "active measures" campaign in Europe and America.

The international campaign for United Nations imposition of a total mandatory and binding international economic boycott against South Africa is spearheaded by various African states backed to the hilt by the Soviet bloc. Both in America and in the European countries who are South Africa's major trading partners, the campaigns are coordinated by the ANC's solidarity networks. (Shades of the various Central American solidarity networks, e.g., CISPES).

There is some peculiar self-delusion found among ANC supporters. Some back ANC because they see it as their revolutionary duty to support so-called "national liberation movements." Overall, they are a minority. Many more among the public figures in the so-called "anti-apartheid" campaigns understand that the brutal assassinations of moderate black spokesmen, community leaders, individuals known to oppose ANC, police officers and those who work in some capacity for the government, the atrocities in which ANC-inspired mobs hack and burn alive the infants, children, wives and other relatives of their victims or intended victims, the car bombs and sabotage are prima facie evidence that ANC is a terrorist group of the most vicious nature. Even Bishop Desmond Tutu has implored the militants to stop their reign of terror—or "I'll pack my bags, collect my family and leave," as he himself put it last week. But our activists omit from their calculations those atrocities perpetrated on blacks by the ANC and South African Communist Party and deplore the fact that the white government has declared a state of emergency to put down the terror.

At bottom, the excuses for ANC terrorism amount to "the devil made them do it"—the devil being South Africa's racial policies. When did the fact that you do not like someone's presumed politics give you the right to disembowel his wife and burn his children to death? Individuals are responsible for their own actions; no one who argues that a grievance against society justifies murder can retain credibility as a "human rights" advocate. Those who take that position may well believe that similar tactics should be applied in America. Even six generations after civil war and 30 years after the civil rights movement was launched, we have failed to construct the racial utopia that is demanded overnight of South Africa. Thirty-five million Americans are living below the poverty line—most of them blacks. Does that justify terrorism?

The fact that South Africa has scrapped many repugnant racial rules seems to have no impact on the anti-South Africa lobby. Perhaps with their minds made up, they do not want to be confused by facts. They want revolution.

The strategic needs of our own people should be the overriding concern of Congress, but the anti-South Africa forces, including the Marxists, are arguing that apartheid problem is not a political one capable of rational political solutions involving formulae for opening the South African political power structure by degrees to all the people. Rather, they say it is a moral issue. So they preach that "apartheid" is a sin, and that those "sinners" should stop sinning at once without respect to any other consideration such as transferring power in an orderly manner and maintaining social order. Pretoria, for its part, should begin by bringing black leaders, who renounce violence, into a new power-sharing system.

ANTI-SOUTH AFRICAN LOBBY TRACED TO LEFT-WING GROUPS

(By Arnaud de Borchgrave)

Dennis V. Brutus, 60, one of the most influential political leaders of the anti-South Africa lobby in America, told an activist audience in Washington recently that the key U.S. groups in the network against South Africa were the American Committee on Africa (ACOA); Washington Office on Africa (WOA); TransAfrica and the coalition it heads called the Free South Africa Movement (FSAM); and the Institute for Policy Studies (IPS).

If his audience was particularly pleased, it may have been because he was addressing an IPS seminar audience that was representative of those organizations. He himself is prominent in the U.S. committee of the London-based International Defence and Aid Fund (IDAF) and The Africa Network (TAN), and was co-founder of the American Coordinating Committee for Equality in Sport and Society (ACCESS), which took the lead in setting up protests against a tour by South Africa's Springbok rugby team.

Mr. Brutus was born in Rhodesia and is a citizen of Zimbabwe. He left South Africa for London in 1966, having become active with the African National Congress (ANC) in the early 1950s. His current role is to present the political action desires of the ANC to the intellectual leaders and activists of the American left. He is effective at that. With turmoil in South Africa having driven Communist expansionism in Central America from the headlines, The Washington Times will examine some key organizations of the Network against South Africa.

The International Defense and Aid Fund was established in London in the 1960s by South African "exiles" to raise funds to help defray legal defense costs for black South Africans charged with treason, terrorism and other serious offenses. Mr. Brutus has been involved with IDAF for many years.

As for the activist credentials of Mr. Brutus, from 1948 to 1961 he taught English and Afrikaans in various South African schools, became active in ANC, and founded the campaign to expel South Africa from international sporting events. The 1961-63 period encompassed ANC's first terrorist campaign and his ANC affiliation cost Mr. Brutus his government teaching post. He was arrested in 1963 for violating the terms of his banning and was released on pretrail bond.

Mr. Brutus' reaction to this was extraordinary. He promptly fled to Mozambique where he was arrested by the Portugese and extradicted to South Africa.

Mr. Brutus served an 18-month sentence on Robben Island where he was in the same work detail as Nelson Mandela of the ANC. Mr. Brutus claims to have hidden Mr. Mandela in his home while an underground fugitive. On his release, Mr. Brutus took his wife and seven children to London, where he led a number of campaigns organized by IDAF.

In 1978, the London Economist's prestigious Foreign Report published discussion documents by a Dutch support group for the ANC called Ikhela. The word means "spark" in Zulu, echoing Lenin's "Iskra" publication which was "spark" in Russian. Members of the Dutch leftist group came to support a "black nationalist" faction in ANC. In defense of that faction, which wanted to expel the white Communists from ANC, they commented that "since the very beginning, the politics of the liberation movement in exile has been under the domination of the South African Communist Party;" and that as a result of SACP dominance, only two issues "formed the backbone of the anti-apartheid politics: the disinvestment issue and the armed struggle."

Ikhela criticied the IDAF as "an inconsistent jelly-fish" that "appears to be Christian-motivated," but accepts a program politically "run along highly sectarian lines" and is "controlled by members of the South African Communist Party."

IDAF has received sustantial grants from the World Council of Churches, the U.S. National Council of Churches, and from the government of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic—in other words, the government of the Soviet Union. The Ukrainian SSR told the U.N. General Assembly it was "making regular contributions to the International Defense and Aid Fund."

There is no evidence in the public record that Mr. Brutus is a secret member of the South African Communist Party. In 1970, he moved to the United States to teach literature at Northwestern University. He did not come for political reasons or to seek political asylum; but, as he told The Washington Post more recently, because "Northwestern made me the best offer." Mr. Brutus has been associated with a number of anti-South African groups, and prominently with the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service tried for years to deport Mr. Brutus as an excludable alien under the McCarran Act provisions barring communists and members of communist-controlled organizations. The government was not willing to disclose to Mr. Brutus or his attorneys from Chicago's People's Law Office the sources of their intelligence concerning him. Declassified FBI documents and Justice Department legal papers have linked People's Law Office lawyers and staff to the terrorist Weather Underground Organization and to the Puerto Rican FALN (Armed Forces of National Liberation of Puerto Rico).

In 1983, after two years of proceedings, during which Mr. Brutus' cause was supported by Chicago Mayor Harold Washington, Cardinal Joseph Bernardin, former Illinois Sen. Charles Percy (who then was chairman of the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee), House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., Sens. Howard Metzenbaum, Edward Kennedy and then Massachusetts Sen. Paul Tsongas, a federal judge granted Mr. Brutus political asylum in the United States.

KGB FRONTS PUSH CAMPAIGN TO DESTABILIZE SOUTH AFRICA

The protest campaign against South Africa corresponds to a pattern established by the Soviet KGB as one part of a broad "active measures" campaign that is being implemented by the U.S.S.R.'s "assets"—witting and unwitting—in the United States and Western Europe.

Is there collateral for that assertion? Yes, from the Federal Bureau of Investigation. FBI Assistant Director Edward O'Malley, in testimony before the House Intelligence Committee, held up as an example of "specific Soviet active measures, activities and operations in the United States" a conference of anti-South African activists in New York. Many of the initiators and leaders of the present protest participated actively in that conference whose "stars" were the political leadership of the African National Congress (ANC), which resumed terrorist operations against civilian targets in South Africa after the former Portuguese colonies of Mozambique and Angola achieved independence under Soviet-allied Marxist regimes and provided ANC with bases.

In 1961, at the instigation of the South African Communist Party (SACP), the ANC commenced a terrorist campaign. ANC formed a terrorist cadre called "Unkonto We Sizwe" (Spear of the Nation in Zulu), led by Nelson Mandela, who was not a member of the Communist Party but worked closely with it.

Not too long ago, the New York Times commented that Mr. Mandela would probably become the first black prime minister in the "new order" in South Africa. When he was on trial, Mr. Mandela delivered a statement in open court in which he said, "I admit immediately . . . that I was one of the persons who helped to form Umkonto We Sizwe, and that I played a prominent role in its affairs until I was arrested in August 1962." He said, "I do not deny that I planned sabotage," and continued, "I did not plan it . . . because I have any love of violence. I planned it as a result of a calm and sober assessment of the political situation. . . ." (Note: Quoted in the African Communist, official publication of the SACP, 3rd Quarter, 1964.)

The terrorist campaign failed. There was no rebellion, and the ANC and the SACP were outlawed and dwindled. They became primarily exile movements based in London whose publications were produced in East Germany. During the late 1960s and through the 1970s, ANC cadre received training in the Soviet bloc, Algeria, Libya, several Marxist African states and in Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) camps. Johnstone Makatini, the ANC representative in Algiers during the early 1970s, now their U.N. observer, was responsible for organizing terrorist training for selected ANC members in the Soviet Union.

Following the Portuguese "carnation revolution" of 1974, pro-Soviet regimes took power in Mozambique and Angola which gave ANC training facilities after the 1976 Soweto riots produced a flood of new militant recruits. The camps were staffed by Cuban, East German, Soviet and other bloc experts. Selected ANC members were given advanced training in the Soviet Union, Cuba and several East European countries.

The principal coordinator of the Free South Africa Movement (FSAM) is Randall Robinson, executive director of TransAfrica, a self-described "lobby" formed eight years ago "to inform and organize popular opinion in the United States to advocate policies and practices that will help to achieve a more progressive U.S. foreign policy toward the nations of Africa and the Caribbean and peoples of Africa descent generally throughout the world." As translated into action, TransAfrica has promoted the interests of the ANC, SWAPO and Moscow-allied client regimes in Africa and the Caribbean. The link with the ANC has been open.

Recently, Dennis Brutus, a "political refugee" who successfully resisted U.S. efforts to deport him as an "excludable alien" under the McCarran act, and is one of the most influential interpreters of ANC's political wishes to the U.S. anti-South Africa movement, described the American Friends Service Committee (AFSC), Washington Office on Africa (WOA), American Committee on Africa (ACOA), TransAfrica and its Free South Africa Coalition (FSAM), and the Institute for Policy Studies (IPS) as providing the leadership for the U.S. anti-South Africa campaign.

Those ties are not recent developments. There was, for example, a conference on American divestment legislation supported by the United Nations Special Committee Against Apartheid and nine American groups in June 1981. Organizations taking leadership roles included the AFSC, ACOA, IPS, TransAfrica and WOA, along with several projects set up jointly and separately by these groups. ANC president Oliver Tambo had met with some of the leading figures a week before the conference in Atlanta. Others prominent in the conference were members of TransAfrica's board along with some leaders or communist front organizations used by the Soviets as vehicles for "active measures" and "disinformation" operations.

During the last four years, Mr. Tambo has made repeated trips to the United States for meetings with his U.S. supporters.

The October 1981 "Conference in Solidarity with the Liberation Struggles of Southern Africa," named by FBI Assistant Director O'Malley as a classic example of Soviet "active measures," had at least 20 officals of the ANC present. ANC president Tambo was unable to attend, but the ANC delegation "working" the conference was ably headed by Thabo Mbeki, Mr. Tambo's personal aide; Johnstone Mfanafuthi Makatini, ANC's chief U.N. representative; Yusuf Saloojee, ANC's representative in Canada; David Ndaba of the U.N. observer delegation, and others.

As violence erupted in the black townships of South Africa, Mr. Ndaba, administrative secretary of ANC's U.N. group who said he was involved in the Soweto riots of 1976, explained ANC's rationale for violence against black and colored moderates. The aim is to destroy by terrorism any alternative or moderate voice to the ANC and to use terror to bring the urban black population under ANC control. Any form of cooperation with the system would bring death and would demonstrate to black moderates that the government was incapable of protecting them from ANC violence.

Mr. Ndaba described the riots as "mass struggles carried out . . . to destroy the . . . institutions which make it possible for that regime to dominate our people. These mass political actions are accompanied by armed actions carried out by the . . . African National Congress."

Terming the violence that has killed an estimated 450 black South Africans "people's war," Mr. Ndaba noted that in a New Year's message last year, several weeks before South Africa and Mozambique signed the Nkomati pact that brought expulsion of the ANC from their Mozambican bases, Oliver Tambo called on ANC supporters "to make themselves ungovernable, to make apartheid institutions unworkable, and to challenge these institutions by confronting the most vulnerable links of the apartheid regime, and eventually, to change the racist rule in Pretoria."

The slaughter of black people at the hands of the ANC mobs did not seem to upset Mr. Ndaba, who said that "a number of black stooges have been killed; many heads of black townships have been petrol-bombed because the people are now challenging these collaborators. . . . The issue of black collaborators is becoming . . . a major issue." [NOTE: Interview was published in The Black Scholar, a Marxist monthly—contributing editors range from Angela Davis and several TransAfrica directors to leaders of terrorist Republic of New Afrika.]

During the congressional debates on economic sanctions against South Africa, many wondered whether U.S. measures to isolate South Africa were of any real significance. ANC's U.N. officials insist that the campaign against South Africa here is critical to their success.

Mr. Ndaba said at the start of the FSAM protests that "We will appeal to the black people in this country to take their place as the leading force of the anti-apartheid movement in this country. . . . It won't be until the Afro-Americans have taken the struggles . . . to the same level as Americans did in opposing the war in Vietnam that we will finally achieve our freedom." That ANC officials likened South Africa to "another Vietnam war" that produced over a million refugee "boat people" could indicate what lies in store for South Africa should ANC be victorious.

Mr. Ndaba said, "How long the struggle will be allowed to last depends to a great extent on how strong an anti-apartheid movement will develop in the United States to reverse the policies of the U.S. administration with whomever is in power—Republicans or Democrats. . . . It is true that the liberation of the people of South Africa will be brought about by the people of South Africa. . . . But the international community and Afro-Americans here can really play a complementary role. What we are saying is that this complementary role is indispensable. We can no longer do without your support, and the time for that support is now."

Mr. Ndaba's boss at the U.N. observer group, Mr. Makatini, confirmed the high value the ANC places on the U.S. anti-South Africa campaigns to ease the path for their armed revolution during his March 29 appearance on the MacNeil/Lehrer/Newshour. During the interview, Mr. Makatini said the current level of violent protests in South Africa meant people were reaching "the position reached by the ANC in 1961—that non-violence could not work against the apartheid regime." He continued indicating that ANC's 1961 venture into terrorist "armed struggle" failed in large part because South Africa was isolated and the neighboring territories were "under colonial domination themselves. . . . But today, they are potential rear bases, and nothing can stop that revolution Nothing."

Asked whether there was an alternative to violent revolution, Mr. Makatini did not directly answer. Instead he asked for "effective international action in the form of the imposition of comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against South Africa," and explained: "That would help to shorten the duration of the inevitable armed conflict. It would help lessen the loss of human lives. But nothing can stop the bloodshed now because we've been bleeding for the past 300 years, and it's soon that the bleeding has to be on both sides."

SOUTH AFRICA'S SURVIVAL ESSENTIAL TO UNITED STATES AS SOURCE OF KEY MATERIALS

Leaders of the U.S. network against South Africa concentrate on creating a public sense of moral repugnance surrounding apartheid and the injustices of the South African system. So far, so good. At least on the surface.

Censorship by omission, however, is wheeled into play when it comes to the U.S. national interest in maintaining a steady supply of strategic minerals. In the Free World, only South Africa produces many of the strategic minerals essential in defense and modern industry. To boycott South Africa would render the Soviet Union our sole source for these materials.

During the Rhodesian boycott, the Soviet Union quickly snapped up Rhodesian chrome—no compunction at all about trading through third parties with a white supremacist regime—and sold it back to the United States at a premium.

The politicians and "solidarity" activists of Europe and America do not have a monopoly on this sort of hypocrisy. When speaking privately with leaders of the black-ruled countries of southern and central Africa, I found a keen recognition that the economic survivial of their countries depends on South Africa.

Zambia, Zimbabwe, Angola, Mozambique, Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, even Nigeria (albeit covertly), and other African states rely on South Africa for much of their technology and skilled technicians; for food and other imports; as an export market and for assistance in getting their goods to world markets; and for the foreign exchange earned in South Africa by their black citizens who find jobs there.

Revolution in South Africa would mean disaster for black Africans. Nevertheless, whenever the United Nations is assembled, its diplomats stand up and pronounce dire imprecations on the heads of South African whites while singing the praises of the African National Congress terrorists and blacks killing other blacks for "collaboration" with the government.

Among the U.S. groups that have pioneered the "moral" argument for sanctions against, and revolutionary change in, South Africa are the American Committee on Africa (ACOA) and its "independent" spin-off, the Washington Office on Africa (WOA); the American Friends Service Committee (AFSC); TransAfrica; and the Institute for Policy Studies (IPS). Each has provided "moral support" and sometimes more to the African National Congress (ANC), whose Soviet-allied revolutionaries began committing acts of terrorism against civilians more than two decades ago.

AMERICAN COMMITTEE ON AFRICA

George Houser, founder and executive director of the American Committee on Africa, celebrated the 25th anniversary of the organization by writing a booklet history of the committee called "Meeting Africa's Challenge: The Story of the American Committee on Africa."

According to Mr. Houser, now retired from ACOA, the impetus for the committee arose in 1951 during London meetings between U.S. black activist Bill Sutherland and the editor of ANC's newspaper, "African World," who told Mr. Sutherland about ANC's plans to launch the "Defiance Campaign" of the early 1050s. When Mr. Sutherland returned to the United States, he told Mr. Houser, who then was executive secretary of the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) and race relations secretary of the Fellowship of Reconciliation (FOR), about ANC's plans. Still, according to Mr. Houser, "We wrote to Walter Sisulu, the secretary general of the African National Congress . . . [who] responded eagerly, and in New York we decided to set up an ad hoc organization, which we called Americans for South African Resistance (AFSAR), in support of this campaign."

Mr. Houser reported that when the "Defiance Campaign" started in June 1952, its link to the ANC was Professor Z.K. Matthews, head of ANC's Cape branch, who had just arrived to teach at Union Theological Seminary. He remained in "constant touch" with ANC leaders in South Africa, and he was the source for bulletins issued by AFSAR. Mr. Houser also said that "AFSAR . . . raised several thousand dollars which, through Z.K. Matthews, was sent to ANC." When the ANC effort collapsed in 1953, AFSAR was reorganzied into ACOA. The "Defiance" support set the pattern for ACOA activities.

Mr. Houser's organization shifted its focus to supporting Algeria's National Liberation Front (FLN) whose eight year civil war was marked by atrocities and violence and repression that left one million dead.

Mr. Houser explained that "ACOA worked closely with . . . the FLN representatives in New York and at the U.N. Numerous public meetings were sponsored to call attention to the Aglerian struggle and to condemn the support the U.S. was giving France." He also recalled that ACOA was the first to display the flag of the FLN's provisional revoluntionary government at public meetings in New York.

Mr. Houser claimed that "there is not a major liberation movement in southern Africa which has not received some support from ACOA." "Much of this," he volunteered, "has been done through the Africa Defense and Aid Fund . . . sometimes the assistance given is to cover the emergency needs of visitors to New York and U.N. or to liberation movement leaders traveling in the U.S. It may help with travel expenses, accommodations, telephone bills, etc. . . . In the case of some of the liberation movements . . . ACOA has taken major responsibility for raising the funds to make it possible for the organization to have an office and a full-time representative here."

During the 1970s, Mr. Houser described ACOA logistical support to "liberation movements" as including the supply of vehicles such as jeeps, Land Rovers and Volkswagen buses. Anti-communist and non-communist forces were slighted. For example, in Angola, there were three armed movements: The then-Peking-allied FNLA led by Holden Roberto, the Nationalist UNITA headed by Jonas Savimbi and the Soviet-controlled MPLA. According to Mr. Houser, "a lengthy discussion was held in 1970, and the decision was to recognize the primacy of the MPLA at that time." The Marxist-Leninist MPLA, with Soviet assistance and Cuban troops, fought its way to power in 1975.

ACOA's Washington lobbying activities were outlined by Mr. Houser. "ACOA," he wrote, "has consistently opposed U.S. policies" in South Africa. The organization's representatives have appeared on numerous occasions before "the appropriate Senate and House committees. ACOA has kept a full-time office in Washington since 1968. Funds for the Washington operation, according to Mr. Houser's organizational history, have been provided primarily by four religious denominations: "Methodist, Presbyterian, United Church of Christ and Episcopalian." When these churches wanted to take a more active role against South Africa, he explained, "ACOA's Washington office was transformed into the independent, jointly sponsored Washington Office on Africa."

Among the best known ACOA representatives have been Mr. Houser himself before his retirement; Jennifer Davis, a South African "exile" who replaced him as executive director after years as ACOA's research director; and New York attorney Peter Weiss, who was ACOA president for 10 years and provided a significant amount of funding to ACOA's tax-exempt spin-off, The Africa Fund, through the Samuel Rubin Foundation. Mr. Weiss has perfomed similar functions on the board of Institute for Policy Studies (IPS), which has cooperated with the ACOA on campaigns for legislation against U.S. bank loans to South Africa and other issues.

AMERICAN FRIENDS SERVICE COMMITTEE

The Philadelphia-based American Friends Service Committee (AFSC) increased the level of its southern Africa program in 1974 when it hired as program director Bill Sutherland, co-founder of ACOA. Mr. Sutherland moved to Africa in 1953 and later worked for the first government of Ghana under Kwame Nkrumah. He played a role in organizing the 1958 All African Peoples Conference in Accra. From 1963 to 1975, Mr. Sutherland was an employee of the Tanzanian Ministry of Foreign Affairs. When he went to work for the AFSC, he moved to Lusaka, Zambia.

The general trend of the AFSC southern Africa program was visible in the August 1977 16-member AFSC delegation Mr. Sutherland led on a tour of the "front-line" states. The proclaimed purpose was to "build relationships with the opponents of the status quo in southern Africa, particularly the liberation movements."

TRANSAFRICA

The principal coordinator of the Free South Africa Movement (FSAM) protest coalition is Randall Robinson, executive director of TransAfrica. The group was formed eight years ago "to inform and organize popular opinion in the United States to advocate policies and practices that will help to achieve a more progressive U.S. foreign policy toward the nations of Africa and the Caribbean and peoples of African descent generally throughout the world."

As this policy was translated into action, TransAfrica has promoted the interests of the ANC, the South-West Africa People's Organization (SWAPO) and Moscow-allied client regimes in Africa and the Caribbean. The link with the ANC has been open.

After graduating from Harvard Law School, Mr. Robinson worked in Tanzania as a Ford Foundation fellow before returning to Boston to practice public interest law. In 1975 he joined the staff of Rep. William Clay, D-Mo. Later he worked for Rep Charles Diggs, D-Mich. ACOA's former executive director, George Houser, wrote that his organization had "maintained a working relationship" with Mr. Diggs, who was chairman of the House subcommittee on Africa. Mr. Robinson was executive director of the Congressional Black Caucus before taking on the TransAfrica project. His brother is Chicago-based television newsman Max Robinson.

The roll call of past and present members of the TransAfrica board of directors includes Harry Belafonte; the Rev. Isaac Bivens, United Methodist Church Board of Global Missions, Courtland Cox; Dr. Carlton Goodlett, for many years a member of the Presidium of the Soviet-controlled World Peace Council and publisher of two San Francisco-area black community newspapers; William Lucy of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME); R. Prexy Nesbitt, former IPS fellow who headed the World Council of Churches Program to Combat Racism; the Rev. Wyatt Tee Walker; and Ronald Walters.

The list shows a preponderance of personalities on the left wing of the American political spectrum with respect to South Africa and other social issues.

INSTITUTE FOR POLICY STUDIES

The Institute for Policy Studies (IPS), which has offices just off Dupont Circle in Washington has amassed a 20-year public record remarkable for its consistency in supporting disarmament (by the West), nonintervention against Soviet surrogates, but intervention against authoritarian governments aligned with the West, abolition of nuclear power (by the West), and the drastic curtailment of intelligence and internal security agencies (the American ones).

IPS and its subsidiary, the Transnational Institute (TNI), which has offices in Amsterdam as well as in IPS's Washington headquarters, play central roles in coordinating pressure campaigns on parliaments in Europe and on the U.S. Congress for such policies. In part, IPS exercises influence through a network of "progressive" congressional staff aides. IPS has acted as a conduit for Soviet and Cuban disinformation themes.

In 1982, the institute concluded a formal "exchange" agreement with the Arbatov Institute in Moscow and another Soviet agency, both used by Soviet intelligence for "active measures." The IPS/Soviet 1983 "Bilateral Exchange" conference in Minneapolis attracted Soviet GRU (military intelligence) Gen. Mikhail Milsteyn and others from those agencies experienced in "active measures" and political influence operations.

IPS Chairman Peter Weiss was president of ACOA for 10 years. Other IPS figures have been affiliated with the committee. Members of IPS's Southern Africa Project and Militarism and Disarmament Project have played key roles in coordinating divestment and anti-bank loan campaigns in Western Europe and the United States. Indeed, the Committee to Oppose Bank Loans to South Africa operated from IPS's headquarters and ACOA's New York office.

Even more significant was the central role of a member of the ANC and the South African Communist Party Central Committee, Ruth First Slovo, in organizing IPS/TNI solidarity efforts. Ruth First was killed in 1982 by a parcel bomb which exploded at ANC headquarters in Maputo. Her husband Joe Slovo heads the ANC's "military" arm, the terrorist "Umkonto we Sizwe" cadre. The Lithuanian-born Mr. Slovo, a member of the SACP Politburo and the ANC Revolutionary Council, was a lawyer in South Africa until ANC and the SACP commenced terrorist operations in the early 1960s. South African authorities have identified him as holding the rank of colonel in the Soviet KGB.

Yes, apartheid is repugnant. But there is a lot more to the anti-South African campaign than meets the eye in the current deluge of press releases.

PRETORIA'S ECONOMIC FUTURE

(By Michael Spicer)

JOHANNESBURG.—International pressure on the South African government to change its racial policies can be effective—if it is the right kind of pressure. But the type of economic sanctions the United States Congress is in the process of approving are likely to be counterproductive: If effective, they would harm South Africa's economic future without strengthening the negotiating position of black South Africans.

The debate over disinvestment and other economic sanctions, conducted so vigorously over the past six months in the U.S., has had both positive and negative aspects for South Africans.

In the past, external pressure has played a part in promoting reform in South Africa. Just as sports boycotts have contributed to the process of integrating South African sport, so the sanctions debate has given impetus to coordinated South African business efforts to abolish apartheid.

South Africa's six employer federations represent English, Afrikaans, and black businessmen. When Sen. Edward M. Kennedy—a proponent of no new U.S. investment in South Africa—was in South Africa in January, the federations handed him a memorandum committing themselves to the fundamentals of a nonracial society.

The disinvestment campaign in the U.S. has certainly had a pronounced educational effect on all the key players in the U.S.-South African equation.

The proposals accepted June 4 by the U.S. Senate would have the U.S. government strengthen the negotiating position of South African blacks by increasing scholarships for blacks and providing support for organizations actively opposing apartheid, and they would extend U.S. government loans and lending guarantees to black-owned businesses.

Those striving for evolutionary reform in South Africa are not so naive as to suppose that a vigorous process of bargaining between whites, other minority groups, and their increasingly activist black fellow citizens will be an entirely comfortable experience. But they believe that economic growth will not only make the process sustainable in removing the fear of many whites that negotiation is a game of "winners and losers" but will also offer a prize worth promoting moderation: a viable and expanding economy.

The impact of the disinvestment debate on the South African government is less easy to judge. Americans, accustomed to the difficulty of encouraging the Soviet Union, Poland, Cuba, and others to make reforms by means of sanctions, should by now understand that the most common political response to that threat is an assertion of sovereignty and noncompliance. Nicaragua is but the latest example.

This counterproductive side of pressure was demonstrated in President P.W. Botha's sternly inflexible performance when interviewed by Ted Koppel on ABC's "Nightline" in March.

The ruling National Party, faced by a sizable and vocal white right wing, cannot afford to be seen to be changing at America's behest. One ironic effect of the disinvestment threat from the US may well have been to encourage Pretoria to use more strong-arm tactics within Southern Africa.

The manifest absurdity of linking timetables for South African reform to the US election cycle compounds the concern that, as with the sports boycott, the target will be a constantly shifting one in which the confusion of motives and goals of the disinvestment lobby will encourage a constant upping of the ante. In this respect even the mildest of symbolic measures supposedly intended to "send a message to Pretoria" may turn out to open a back door to real and damaging disinvestment measures.

Blacks in South Africa, fragmented in many ways as they are, have pretty generally combined to oppose the Reagan administration's South African policy of constructive engagement, which they believe takes no account of their interests. Manipulating the moral imperative of Americans in the interests of resisting apartheid has become a goal common to black South Africans.

One of the most interesting cleavages, however, that may be observed in black South African reactions to disinvestment is the distinction often drawn between threat and reality. Many black trade unions, as willing as others to encourage the threat of disinvestment as a stick with which to belabor Pretoria, are ambivalent about the debate moving on to actual implementation of disinvestment of sanctions. That would conflict with the unions' interest in preserving or maintaining their power base, which can only be achieved if the South African economy is not damaged and continues to grow.

Economic growth has been a major factor in breaking down apartheid. In short, a rigid social, economic, and political order is incompatible with a modern industrial state. But political will is required to create an even more just and equitable society. In that respect, international pressure, if calculated on the basis of the limits of its leverage—although recognizing the potential for provoking a counterproductive defensive posture within South Africa—can act as an important spur.

Insofar as the United States has the capacity to influence developments in South Africa, it needs to do so with the long-term future of South Africa in mind. America's own historical experience should help US citizens understand that truism—and lead toward a policy aimed at strengthening black negotiating power, and not toward damaging a productive economic future which all South Africans are working to bring about.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN GOVERNMENT IS MAKING A GRAVE MISTAKE IN NOT INSISTING ON AN ANSWER TO THE QUESTION: WITH WHAT SHALL APARTHEID BE REPLACED?

(By William Rusher)

Watching developments—both good and bad—in South Africa, and the responses thereto in the United States and elsewhere, I am struck by the fact that South Africa is failing to make one extremely important point in its own behalf.

The typical discussion of South Africa and its problems, at least in the United States, opens with declarations by everyone present that South Africa's current policy of apartheid is "abhorrent," and then goes on to analyze some subordinate aspect of the problem: should the South African government release Nelson Mandela unconditionally? Should the United States bar further loans to South Africa by American banks? And so on.

Seldom, if ever, do the discussants pause to specify what ought to replace apartheid. For apartheid—meaning those laws that discriminate against blacks, and especially those that bar blacks from participating in the political process—cannot simply be abolished: it must be replaced by something else.

And I have come to the conclusion that the South African government is making a grave mistake in not insisting on an answer to the question: with what shall apartheid be replaced?

It is not a trick question, or an unanswerable one. In fact, there are dozens of possible answers to it, each with its adherents. But it is a difficult question, because every answer is, in one way or another, manifestly unsatisfactory.

The most clear-cut and sweeping answer, favored by many if not most South Africa blacks and many of South Africa's more extreme foreign critics, is summed up in the formula, "One man, one vote, in a unitary state." That is to say, simply confer the franchise on every adult citizen inside the present borders of the Republic of South Africa, regardless of race, and may the best man win.

This solution has at least the merit of simplicity, and is moreover the system followed (more or less) in most of the world's democratic societies. But South Africa is, without much question, the most piebald, polyglot society on earth: a nation in which a high European culture composed of 5 million English- and Dutch-descended whites, 2.5 million long-acculturated "coloureds" of mixed ancestry, and perhaps a million "Asians" of Indian descent, plus an indeterminate number of blacks, exists side by side with a numerically dominant group of primitive, tribalized blacks who 150 years ago possessed neither a written language nor the principle of the wheel.

I do not say that South Africa's American critics, if pressed, would refuse to argue that it should submit itself unconditionally to rule by this black majority. But I notice that they don't dwell on the subject any longer than they have to, and I am confident that they would lose, if they adopted such a position, a large portion of the sympathy the anti-South African cause enjoys in the United States, because most Americans understand instinctively the inevitable and disastrous consequences of such a "solution." The implacable evolution of Robert Mugabe's Zimbabwe into a one-party tribal dictatorship is an object lesson to everyone.

Apartheid in its present form is not the answer, either—as the South African government fully recognizes. But, as noted earlier, there are other ways of assuring every citizen of South Africa full and equal participation in the political processes that affect his life—most of them involving drastic partition of the present republic, plus consensual processes for matters of common concern. That is the direction South Africa is heading in already—the only sensible direction in which it can head. If it meanwhile insisted on more candor from its critics, it would succeed in demonstrating both the true difficulty of its problem and the wisdom of its unfolding policy.

THE DANGEROUS SITUATION DOES NOT MEAN CONSTRUCTIVE ENGAGEMENT WAS OR IS WRONG; IT'S THE ONLY POLICY THAT HOLDS ANY HOPE FOR A JUST POLITICAL EVOLUTION

(By Smith Hempstone)

Events in mineral-rich, strategically located South Africa, where President P.W. Botha declared a state of emergency Sunday, are fast approaching a point of no return.

In September, Mr. Botha—a moderate reformer by the lights of his 2.8 million fellow Afrikaners—introduced a new constitution giving limited political rights to the country's 3.5 million people of Asian and mixed racial origin.

This new constitution, viewed as windowdressing by liberals of all races and as dangerously radical by conservatives among the country's 4.7 million whites, conceded nothing to the nation's 24 million blacks beyond the small, impoverished, nominally autonomous tribal homelands established in 1979. As a gesture toward the 8 million urban blacks, many of whom have never seen these homelands, Mr. Botha threw them the bone of 38 local black councils, giving them at least some control over municipal affairs.

Implementation of the new constitution came hand-in-hand with the deterioration of the economic situation of South Africa, which is engaged in an expensive war against Angola-based Namibian guerrillas.

South African blacks not only are politically disenfranchised but are, in the main, confined to the lowest rungs of the economic ladder. Three million blacks lack work in a nation where unemployment compensation is virtually unknown. Even those who have jobs find themselves losing economic ground in the face of a wave of inflation that this year will exceed 16 percent.

Growing discontent with overcrowded black schools and inadequate housing fueled the political flames ignited by the new constitution. In disorders during the 10 months since then, 443 people—all but one of them black—have lost their lives. In the past year, 27 black mayors (and 213 other municipal officials) resigned amid accusations they were serving the cause of white domination. Of the 38 black municipal councils established by Mr. Botha, only five are functioning toady.

The state of emergency declared by Mr. Botha, the first called in a quarter-century of racial turmoil, unleashes the full power of the state against dissidents in 36 South African cities and towns.

The authorities already had at their disposal a massive array of legal weapons. In addition to these, any police or army officer now may arrest without warrant and hold any person for questioning for up to 14 days, and such detention without trial may be lengthened indefinitely by ministerial order.

Premises can be searched and property seized without written authority. The names of those detained cannot be published, permitting the government to wage war against its critics in silence. Curfews can be imposed, and there is no legal redress against the authorities for acts committed by them in the districts to which the emergency applies.

The last South African emergency declared—after the Sharpeville riots of 1960—covered 83 districts and lasted 56 days (under present legislation, a state of emergency is limited to one year).

During those two months, the police detained 11,503 people. Several hundred dissidents of all races were arrested this week in a widespread police dragnet.

What many liberals fear—not entirely without reason—is that this time extreme right-wing elements within the army and police may seek an Argentine solution to South Africa's unrest: the secret elimination of thousands of the government's foes.

It goes without saying that the Reagan administration should warn President Botha that such a policy would have disastrous consequences for white rule in South Africa. In this respect, it ought to be noted in passing that the ill-considered action of the Senate and the House in passing economic sanctions against South Africa earlier this month—the president has yet to sign the bill—is not going to add to American leverage. Once you have imposed sanctions, the threat of so doing no longer exists.

Mr. Botha has indicated in the past that the present constitution is not graven in stone, that he is willing to work out with representative African leaders a new "constitutional dispensation" that will address the legitimate aspirations of urban blacks.

There are moderate black leaders still interested in power-sharing with South African whites rather than their subjugation—Zulu paramount chief Gatsha Buthelezi, for one—and President Ronald Reagan ought to employ the carrot and the stick to get Mr. Botha into serious negotiations with them right now.

The dangerous situation does not mean that Mr. Reagan's policy of "constructive engagement" with South Africa (rather than ostracism) was or is wrong. On the contrary, it is the only policy that holds any hope for a just and peaceful political evoloution, rather than a bloody revolution in which there would be many losers and almost no winners.

What it does suggest is that this policy has not been effectively implemented. This is no time for the American embassy in Pretoria to be leaderless. Ambassador Herman W. Nickel, who has been recalled for consultation, has indicated that he is uninterested in returning, and he ought to be replaced immediately. Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs Chester Crocker has run out his five-year string, and also ought to go.

Both men did their best, but Mr. Botha's declaration of a state of emergency is a measure of their failure. It's time now for some new faces and innovative implementation of a policy that is fundamentally sound.

ABHORRENT SYSTEM: BUT WHY DO BLACKS STILL COME THERE?

(By Joseph Sobran)

My urbane friend and colleague William Rusher notes the comically repetitive formula with which South Africa's racial system is routinely censured: one is required to use the adjective "abhorrent." I think "South Africa's abhorrent system of apartheid" must be the most frequently repeated phrase since "Polly want a cracker?"

Now, nobody feels compelled to refer to "the Soviet Union's abhorrent system of communism," even though that system is obviously far worse than apartheid. The first distinction between forms of government is not whether they are democratic or undemocratic, capitalist or socialist, or even free or unfree; it is whether they are bearable or unbearable.

Apartheid, whatever else it has done, has not driven blacks out of South Africa; on the contrary, South Africa, even with apartheid, attracts black immigration. South Africa has no equivalent of the Berlin Wall; it has no need, as communist systems do, to treat its people as captives who must be prevented from escaping. It is necessary to cling to such basic facts during the storms of propaganda.

So why do we make such a point of calling apartheid "abhorrent"? It's a matter of informal etiquette, like smiling and nodding while shaking hands. It's supposed to show our benevolence toward black people and our detestation—embarrassment, really—at the very idea of white rule.

The white man has been deeply embarrassed about white rule, or "colonialism," for a generation. But we can take this too far: Africa has paid dearly for the biracial mania for getting rid of white rule. The last 25 years have been bitter ones for such newly free African countries as Uganda, Nigeria, Angola, and Mozambique, to name a few.

An article in the Wall Street Journal mentions a farmer in Ghana, who performed a strange ritual before a reporter: He sprinkled a few drops of Scotch on the ground, as a sort of sacrifice, and began a chant. His son explained: "He's praying that the British will come back and make everyone rich."

An English friend of mine tells of a recent trip to Jamaica, which he found sadly dilapidated. He told a native that it was his first visit there since the '50s, when the British still ruled the island. "Ah," said the Jamaican, "the good old days"—then caught himself, embarrassed at what he had admitted. Another friend, just back from India, met an Indian who has a recurrent dream that the British have returned. When he wakes up and finds they haven't, he cries.

Touching stories. They undermine the myth that colonialism was purely evil. In fact no empire can endure unless it brings prosperity to its provinces, as the Roman and British empires did. White rule had its benefits, not because it was white, but because white men happened to be the vehicles of civilization and the rule of law, even when their motives were selfish. The tragedy is that the colonial peoples got their independence before they had fully absorbed the civilized tradition. The poor Ghanaian farmer who thinks the British can magically bring wealth makes the same mistake as the doctrinaire racist: He thinks race itself is the key. But civilized habits are slow to develop and easy to abandon, as the history of Europe in this century proves.

In their way, the liberated African nations have been the victims of an obsession with race. They thought that getting rid of white rule would solve all their problems; and they dispensed with the good institutions that the white man had brought. It was right and natural that they should want independence; it was shortsighted to throw away the rule of law.

The American Revolution succeeded because the Americans were fighting less to get free of England than to keep the traditional freedoms of Englishmen. They were fighting not to destroy, but to conserve.

South Africa has several free institutions that are likewise worth conserving: the rule of law, a market economy, an independent judiciary, a free press. These should be reformed to extend their benefits to blacks, not sacrificed to crude majority rule, especially if such rule would have the character of the murderous mobs who burn and hack to death suspected government informers.

In order to conserve, as Edmund Burke said, you must be able to reform. But to reform you must also know what to conserve. And there are few signs that most of the people who want to destroy the "abhorrent system" even realize that they have anything to lose. They may find out only when they have lost it. It would be a bitter irony if, a few years down the road. South Africa's blacks were praying vainly for the return of white rule.

SEEKING A QUICK FIX: CAN IT BE ACHIEVED WITHOUT PATIENCE?
(By Raymond Price)

Confronted with a wrong, many Americans have a compulsive urge to do something about it, now. But in a sensitive, explosive situation, "now" can be the worst of times.

One of the wisest of Britian's colonial administrators, Sir David Trench, then governor-general of Hong Kong, commented to me nearly 20 years ago about what he saw as a characteristic flaw in American foreign policy. Americans, he said, "seem to have a passion for tying up all the loose ends. Out here, it's often better to leave a few loose ends dangling."

He was right. Patience with "loose ends" is particularly needed when engineering social transformations that pose irreconcilable conflicts among the vital interests of contending groups.

For example, South Africa.

In such a situation, time is needed not only to allay fears and modify attitudes, but also to alter those conditions that make the present circumstances so intractable.

America's new relationship with China, for example, was made possible by deliberately leaving loose ends untied: in particular, by a carefully crafted formula that deferred resolution of the Taiwan issue. Both sides have lived, however uncomfortably, with an understanding that recognizes the principle of one China (a principle that both Peking and Taipei proclaim) but accepts the present existence of two governments. The dramatic evolution of mainland China suggests that time will, in fact, bring a way to bridge the unbridgeable gulf. As conditions in China change, an eventual voluntary union, under terms that recognize a special status for the Taiwanese, seems increasingly possible.

Some will argue that the Taiwan analogy is irrelevant: that the Taiwan dispute is political, and therefore tolerable, while the problem in South Africa is one of racial oppression and therefore intolerable.

However, branding a situation "intolerable" does not create an alternative that will be both tolerable and achievable. The Soviet hold on Eastern Europe is intolerable, but we and the Eastern Europeans have tolerated it for almost 40 years. We fulminate against it, but we don't send NATO armies crashing across the East German frontier—and we don't break diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union. We learned tragically in Hungary in 1956 that encouraging rebellion when we were not in a position to assist that rebellion was, to put it gently, not helpful.

Short term, there simply is no way to restore freedom to Eastern Europe. Long term, there is hope that Eastern Europe will evolve toward freedom.

Tolerating the intolerable, for a time, can be the price of achieving the unachievable. In activities as diverse as love, baseball, politics, and show business, timing is crucial. So, too, in diplomacy. Conditions change. Rulers change. Systems change. Attitudes change. Interests change. What one party to a dispute finds unacceptable today, it may find acceptable tomorrow.

In South Africa, the conflict is not simply black vs. white. The country's whites are also divided, some protesting that the pace of reform is too fast, others that it is too slow. (The nation's most powerful business leader, Sir Harry Oppenheimer, is pressing for more reform.) And blacks as well as whites have cause to fear a too-precipitate change.

To see cause for fear, all they have to do is to look north. Africa is a continental catastrophe. In Uganda—where another coup has just ushered in another regime, promising like those before it to redress the sins of its predecessors—the 100,000 Ugandans killed by their government in recent years have been black, not white. Some had their legs chopped off and were forced to eat the flesh of their fellow prisoners before they themselves were put to death. In country after country, the post-colonial history of the continent has been a tragic chronicle of hopes betrayed, of cruelty, tyranny, corruption, and failure.

In the world's haste to press independence on the African colonies, it was politically easier to be on the side of immediate "change" than to insist on the patience to prepare the way for it, and to accept for a while a temporary wrong in order to achieve a permanent right. Hundreds of millions of black Africans today are paying a terrible price for that impatience.

South Africa is changing. It will continue to change. With luck, change may come at a pace that allows South Africans, black, white, "colored," and Asian alike, to evolve a genuinely multiracial society that preserves the country's strengths while correcting its shortcomings. But achieving this will require leaving some of the loose ends untied. And it will require time, patience, and forebearance, not only from South Africans, but also from the world.

IS UNITED STATES FOR FREEDOM IN AFRICA—OR NOT?

(By Maj. Gen. Henry Mohr (U.S. Army Ret.))

The Soviet Union and its surrogates are gaining a stranglehold on the continent of Africa. A very senior U.S. military officer told me not long ago, "The Russians are walking across the entire face of Africa, practically unopposed."

Yet, free access by all nations to southern Africa's vast storehouse of strategic minerals is critical.

South Africa's policies may not conform to all of our ideals. However, it wasn't long ago that we practiced slavery in the United States. Women did not have the right to vote. A young United States of America would not, in those days, have accepted criticism by other nations of its internal policies, as we are doing to South Africa. Change takes time.

Essentially the same objections being thrown at South Africa were heard earlier about the policies of Rhodesia. People condemned Rhodesia's government because they thought it ruled the predominantly black country with a small white minority.

However, in 1979, Rhodesia had three blacks in its government out of a total of four government leaders. But under international pressures, Rhodesia's government fell. It is now a captive nation—part of the Communist Empire—under the new name of Zimbabwe. We can take no pride in our part of this sorry chapter of history.

Vital U.S. security interests are at stake in Africa. Our only dependable allies on the southern part of the continent are the Republic of South Africa and the UNITA freedom fighters of Angola. Strangely, we are allowing—even helping—surround the fiercely independent nation of South Africa with lustful, Soviet-backed Marxist nations. By yielding to a United Nations decision to turn control of Namibia over to a left-wing terrorist faction called SWAPO, current U.S. policy seems headed toward isolating the anti-Communist freedom fighters of UNITA in Angola from outside support they desperately need. This would leave South Africa encircled on all sides, with its back to the sea.

Angola is partially under a Marxist government, supported by 25,000 or more Soviet-backed Cuban troops, East German secret police and North Koreans. Namibia has become the pawn of diplomats trying to negotiate some Cuban troops out of Angola, perhaps at the cost of Namibia's right to selfdetermination and UNITA's hope for a free Angola.

The "recognized" Communist government of Angola is virtually a city-bound prisoner of the anti-Communist UNITA freedom fighters. Almost with no help, UNITA controls more than half of Angola, and has established an efficient government, operating openly throughout much of the country.

Considerable financial support for the Angolan Marxists comes from U.S. industries, such as Gulf Oil, which have reached an "understanding" with Angola's Marxist government.

The Communists have help from the U.S. Congress, too. It passed the Clark Amendment, which prohibits the U.S. from providing aid to UNITA, just as Congress, in an equally wierd action, has cut aid to the Contras in Nicaragua.

Heroic Angolan resistance to Communism has continued for a decade. It may win, in the end. But the U.S. State Department and Congress have some explaining to do. Is the United States supporting freedom in Africa, or is it not? As of now, neither our record nor our actions, in Angola and Namibia seem consistent with announced U.S. policy.

IMPRESSIONS OF SOUTH AFRICA

1. The Republic of South Africa remains the most interesting country I have ever visited. This hasn't changed during my twenty years of personal involvement—from a Foreign Area Specialist/Student at University of Witwatersrand in Johannesburg to this most recent visit. During this time I have travelled to all corners of this beautiful country and all the surrounding countries/areas as well: Rhodesia/Zimbabwe; Southwest Africa/Namibia; Basutoland/Lesotho; Bechuanaland/Botswana; Swaziland; Angola; and Mozambique/Maputo.

2. I have always felt that external political pressure and threats will accomplish only small changes in the policy of Apartheid. It just drives the Afrikaner ruling group tighter into a laager. For example, the South African armed forces 25 years ago were almost totally dependent upon western sources (allies) for military power. Today they are almost totally self sufficient, producing all the army, navy and air force equipment they need for modern operations. Because third world groups have called repeatedly in the UN for economic embargoes and oil embargoes (never implemented), South Africa is today near self sufficient for power supplies. Their core energy system is based upon the world's largest coal reserves—billions of tons—enough to last 400-500 years. Much of the country's transportation is electrified—powered by electricity from giant coal-burning thermal power plants. Their need for petroleum is largely met by the world's largest and most advanced Oil-from-coal complexes. The government-financed, privately owned, profit making industry is operated by South African Synthetic Oil Limited (SASOL). There are now three gigantic SASOL plants built on top of huge coal fields producing the entire range of petroleum products from coal. There are petroleum-derivative plants circling the basic operation which siphon off residuals to produce over 100 byproducts; chemicals; gases; and feedstock for plastics and fertilizers. These huge areas look like something from a science fiction movie.

3. In my estimation, the integration of South Africa society is still decades away. It will come and will be driven by economics. This is a modern, industrialized society coexisting with primitive tribal customs and beliefs. The catalyst for change is the absolute requirement (growing all the time) for a skilled work force. This has produced a large urban non-white population which has become highly skilled in administrative and technical positions. In this category are all of the Coloreds (2.5 million), Indians (1.0 million), and long term urban blacks (maybe 10 million). Outside this group are blacks living in tribal "homelands" totalling maybe 10 million. These tribes are not homogeneous, but are separated by language, beliefs, customs, and organization. The Zulus are the largest tribe, and by far the most dominant, aggressive group.

The importance of the non-white, skilled urban worker is illustrated by two examples in the heart of white-run industry. Armscor is a government industry which designs and builds, or procures, equipment, supplies, ammunition for the defense forces. Armscor uses extensive non-white labor in the most sensitive areas. There is equal pay for equal work. White supervisors who can't get along and work smoothly with non-whites are fired!

In SASOL, the last two plants were built in record time (six years) by a predominantly non-white labor force and are run today by a highly trained work force containing many nonwhite technicians in sensitive positions. Again there is equal pay for equal work. Non-whites in industrial/urban areas are now able to own/build houses as they can afford with the land secured by 99-year leases. Very attractive government loans are available to non-whites for home finance.

4. Does all of this justify apartheid? Of course not. Are all non-whites moving up economically and socially? Of course not. I'm just providing some evidence for my idea of how the future will develop.

5. The ruling whites are by no means united on how to handle the situation. Even the dominant Afrikaners are divided among themselves. Some basic, rending changes must occur in key areas before political power will begin to move to non-whites. Some of these changes are in the areas of education, rural Afrikaner power, and the Dutch Reformed Church. Changes are occurring at a rapid pace. However, they are happening as the ruling Afrikaners see the need, not as the outside world would desire.

6. Some interesting observations of change on this trip:

a. Black policemen with pistols on their hip at Jan Smuts Airport.

b. Black policemen in highway patrol cars unaccompanied by whites.

c. Colored and black combat units in the Armed Forces, pulling border/combat duty in Namibia and Angola. Black and colored officers and NCOs training along with whites at SADF schools.

d. An evening at the Pretoria (heart of Afrikanerdom) Rotary Club provided these observations: The very impressive President of this Rotary Club is William * * *, who is colored; I noticed several colored and Indian businessmen in the group of 100+; there were a number of blacks, including a gynecologist at my table.

e. During a long discussion with Peter Botha, general manager of Armscor, he described their drive for productiveness and efficiency in these terms: "We are one of the most efficient industrial operations in the world. We cannot afford skilled labor turnover. Our black technicians are paid equal pay for equal work. When we have what appears to be mediocre production it often traces to an unmotivated work group and this often traces to prejudiced, ineffective white supervision at the foreman level. We recently fired a long term white supervisor who ignored two warnings about mishandling black workers. We no longer mix black and white when we start a new line. We go all-white or all-black with black supervisors and find we have no trouble." These are interesting observations from a white manager of Armscor, producing weaponry to preserve the present system.

f. Military magazines and newspapers are giving prominant space to the performance of black units and individual soldiers.

g. There are blacks everywhere in the big cities like Pretoria, Johannesburg, Cape Town twenty-four hours a day. There is no preoccupation with security by the whites. Their homes are much less secure than those in Washington, D.C.

h. Advertising and product packaging is strongly aimed at the huge black urban market.

i. In Cape Province, people are mixed and rubbing shoulders in the parks, on the beaches, in stores, restaurants, transport, literally everywhere. Colored housing areas are adjacent to white housing areas—the houses are the same quality.

7. Is all this a justification for apartheid? Not at all. It illustrates that the white ruling group is caught in an inexorable movement based on economic power. The non-whites will gain political rights. But it will come according to interactions and pressures inside South Africa and will take another twenty years. Millions of non-whites in South Africa are part of the establishment and have something to lose, even though they are unhappy about carrying passbooks, lack of political rights, and all kinds of demeaning racially-based customs. They are the best judges of when and how to push, not outsiders who won't have to lead the charge. The non-whites can paralyze South Africa tomorrow by simply stopping work. They will use their power eventually. Changes may be relatively non-violent compared to U.S. history and they will come much more quickly than in the U.S. South Africa has been an independent country only since 1910 and ruled by the Afrikaners since 1948. It took the U.S. from 1783 until the Supreme Court decision of 1954 to legally eliminate racial discrimination.

8. As stated earlier, the Dutch Reformed Church is virtually a State Church. It is powerful and a center of conservatism. It has evolved an interpretation of the Bible which makes the Afrikaner Volk similar to the Jews, as chosen people of God. Without any real basis in the scriptures, the DRC has largely ignored the entire new testament message and derived a doctrine which justifies the white Volk mission to build the country and take God's message to the (inferior) natives who will at some vague time be modernized and christianized. To do this work, the DRC has created "daughter" churches to carry its unique gospel to the various non-white groups. The religious/psychological support provided by the DRC for apartheid must weaken over time for a more liberal society to evolve peacefully or even semi-peacefully.

PAUL PEARSON.

WASHINGTON, DC,
June 19, 1985.

SIR: As South Africans visiting your great country, we are writing to you because we are concerned about the campaign for punitive measures being waged against our country in the United States.

Like all Americans, we also feel that things have to change in South Africa to bring about a situation of equality of opportunity for all who live in South Africa, regardless of colour, race or creed, in every area of endeavour—political, social, economical and educational. What many Americans apparently do not realise is that things are changing and that the pace of change is accelerating.

We see this as a welcome development and would not like to see the pace of change being slowed down or brought to a halt. We fear that the campaign for disinvestment or sanctions will do just that: it will slow down the pace of change.

It will do far more than that: it will punish the wrong people—those who want to bring about change and those who need it most—namely South Africa's black population who will be hardest hurt in terms of unemployment and economic deprivation if the disinvestment campaign succeeds.

If anyone believes that the Whites of South Africa can be browbeaten into a more reasonable frame of mind by making the Blacks suffer more, he is sorely mistaken. Quite the opposite will happen. Sanctions, therefore, can only reduce the changes of peaceful change in South Africa.

It is supremely ironical that the sanctions campaign is taking place now of all times—when things really are beginning to change. It gives the impression that South Africa is being punished for changing for the better. What South Africa now needs is encouragement—not punishment, if the changes that have stated are to continue and accelerate.

One of the main accusations directed at South Africa is that it is governed without the consent of the majority. How is it to be justified that the very people who make this accusation are now acting in exactly the same way? The vast majority of South Africans—all of the Whites, almost all of the Coloureds and Indians and most of the Blacks reject disinvestment or sanctions. A scientific survey conducted by Professor Laurence Schlemmer of the University of Natal shows that 75 percent of all black South African factory workers are totally opposed to disinvestment. They will feel it most, after all.

That being so, what right have Americans to ignore the wishes of the vast majority of South Africans and increase their hardship and suffering at no cost or suffering to the Americans themselves. It is simply too easy to expect other people to suffer while one sits back in unaffected affluence in the safety of a distant land.

If the pace of change in South Africa is to be helped and quickened, South Africa needs more investment—not less, more job opportunities—not less, more education—not less, and above all, more encouragement—not less. Only by such encouragement and constructive engagement can we achieve what all reasonable Americans and South Africans wish to see: a South Africa in which all the people share equitably in the government, decision-making and the wealth of the land. We all want the same result, but we as South Africans think the methods advocated by the protagonists of punitive measures now, will not help to achieve the desired result.

F.G. BACKMAN,
Dr. W.R. HOODS,
T.L. GOUNDEN,
C.R.E. RENCKEN.
Members of the President's Council on South Africa.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I wish to first of all pay my compliments to the managers of the bill, especially my good friend DICK LUGAR for doing such an outstanding job. I am proud of him.

Mr. President, this is a historic moment in the proud history of America standing up for her ideals.

On January 14, I stood in front of the South African Embassy on Massachusetts Avenue. I said that the conscience of America had begun to move and that action would come on behalf of freedom in South Africa when the American people demanded it. Only 7 months later we stand on this floor to give final congressional approval to legislation imposing significant economic sanctions against South Africa. Decades of tolerant silence by our Government had deadened our sensitivity to the plight of the oppressed of South Africa and lent tacit support to the regime which oppresses them. The passage of this bill shatters that silence. It is a testament to the character of the American people that they have rallied to the cause which is before us today.

Mr. President, passage of this bill is not an academic exercise. What we are attempting to do is make a positive contribution to a moderate process of change in South Africa. Black majority rule is inevitable in South Africa; it will come by evolution or revolution. It is the hope of all who have been involved in this legislation that it will strengthen moderate forces in the black community and encourage the minority government to enter into a sincere dialog. The alternative to such a course is a holocaust for South African blacks and whites. I only hope, Mr. President, that our action has not come too late.

I want to congratulate some of those who have placed a role in passage of this measure. Majority Leader ROBERT DOLE and Chairman LUGAR have provided a timely and fair process through which the Senate could work its will. Senators PROXMIRE, CRANSTON, PELL, ROTH, DODD, MCCONNELL, and MATHIAS made valuable contributions to the drafting of this bill. Our colleagues on the House side, Congressmen GREY, BERMAN, WOLPE, and others built an overwhelming bipartisan consensus for H.R. 1460. But perhaps the greatest debt of gratitude is owed to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]. His trip to South Africa focused the attention of the Nation on this matter. We have all been inspired by his passionate advocacy for an American policy worthy of her ideals and history.

Mr. President, on behalf of Senator KENNEDY and myself, I move to table the conference report, and I hope that everybody on this floor will soundly and roundly defeat Senator KENNEDY and myself.

I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WEICKER].

The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. SYMMS] are necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Stennis] is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STENNIS). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber wishing to vote?

CLOTURE MOTION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I send a cloture motion to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The cloture motion having been presented under rule XXII, the Chair directs the clerk to read the motion.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on the conference report on H.R. 1460, the Anti-Apartheid Act of 1985.

Lowell Weicker, Nancy Landon Kassebaum, Arlen Specter, Dave Durenberger, Bill Cohen, Bob Dole, John H. Chafee, John Danforth, Al Simpson, Daniel J. Evans, Rudy Boschwitz, Bob Packwood, John Heinz, Frank Murkowski, Charles McC. Mathias, and Mark Andrews.

The following proceedings occurred subsequently:

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, on behalf of the majority leader, I ask unanimous consent that for the purpose of rule XXII, the Senate be deemed to be in session on tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. DOMENICI. Further, I ask unanimous consent that at 1 p.m. on Monday, September 9, 1985, there be 3 hours of debate on the conference report to accompany H.R. 1460, to be equally divided; that following the conclusion of the debate, at 4 p.m., the Senate proceed to vote on the cloture motion on the conference report on H.R. 1460.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, will the distinguished Senator indicate the parties between whom the time will be equally divided?

Mr. DOMENICI. The majority leader and the minority leader or their designees.

Mr. BYRD. I have no objection.

Mr. DOMENICI. Finally, I ask unanimous consent that the mandatory quorum under rule XXII be waived.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that remarks I will make in explaining this parliamentary maneuver be included right after the tabulation of the vote so I do not have some Democratic opponent in 1988 waving this in front of me saying that I was for apartheid. A little explanation, I think, is in order.

It was my intention in moving to table the conference report to put the Senate on record on this issue before we recess. I regret that a small number of Senators have chosen to prevent final Senate action tonight, but as this vote indicates, there is overwhelming support for this conference agreement. I look forward to its passage in September by a strong bipartisan vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me indicate I am pleased the Senator has made his announcement for 1988.

UNANIMOUS CONSENT REQUEST

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I wonder if the majority leader would yield to me to propound a brief unanimous-consent request?

Mr. DOLE. Yes; Mr. President.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we have a vote on the passage of the conference report on South Africa at 9 o'clock tonight.

Mr. HELMS. Objection, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. KENNEDY. I ask unanimous consent that we have it at 10 o'clock to-night.

Mr. HELMS. I object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. KENNEDY. I ask unanimous consent that we have it before we go into recess.

Mr. HELMS. I object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE TWO HOUSES FOR THE AUGUST RECESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, for the information of all Senators, it is the intention of the majority leader to bring the Senate back in session on Monday, September 9, 1985, at 12 noon. With that statement, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now turn to the consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 179, the adjournment resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the resolution.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (H. Con. Res. 179) providing for a conditional adjournment of the House from August 1 or 2 to September 4, 1985, and a conditional adjournment of the Senate from August 1 or 2 to September 4 or 9, 1985.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the clerk read the rest of the resolution.

The legislative clerk resumed reading of the resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the House adjourns on Thursday, August 1, 1985, or on Friday, August 2, 1985, pursuant to a motion made by the Majority Leader, or his designee, in accordance with this resolution, it stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian on Wednesday, September 4, 1985, or until 12 o'clock meridian on the second day after Members are notified to reassemble pursuant to section 2 of this concurrent resolution, whichever occurs first, and that when the Senate adjourns on Thursday, August 1, 1985, or on Friday, August 2, 1985, pursuant to a motion made by the Majority Leader in accordance with this resolution, it stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian on Wednesday, September 4, 1985, or until 12 o'clock meridian on Monday, September 9, 1985, pursuant to a motion made by the Majority Leader, or until 12 o'clock meridian on the second day after Members are notified to reassemble pursuant to section 2 of this concurrent resolution whichever occurs first.

SEC. 2. The Speaker of the House and the Majority Leader of the Senate, acting jointly after consultation with the Minority Leader of the House and the Minority Leader of the Senate, shall notify the Members of the House and the Senate, respectively, to reassemble whenever, in their opinion, the public interest shall warrant it.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the clerk. I merely want the Senate to know that under section 2 the leadership of the two Houses is empowered by this resolution to call the Congress back into session if need be.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the distinguished minority leader.

I ask unanimous consent that the mandatory rollcall vote required by 2 U.S.C. section 198 be waived.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 179) was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DOMENICI. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to

FIRST CONCURRENT BUDGET RESOLUTION FOR FISCAL YEARS 1986, 1987, AND 1988—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I understand we can now start the debate on the budget resolution. We do not have the papers yet, but we are going to make the same speeches with or without the papers. It will save us some time. I have a number of Members who have commitments later on this evening. We would like to complete our work this evening and that will begin the August recess. I have asked the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Budget, who is prepared, to make his opening statement, and the distinguished Democratic leader of the Budget Committee [Mr. CHILES] who suggested this procedure.

I hope there is no objection to at least having statements made. We have been debating the budget for 6 months. I would think it could be something we could dispose of in a fairly short time this evening.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, will the majority leader tell us if we can have a time agreement on the budget conference report?

Mr. DOLE. I say to my friend from Arkansas that I thought about a time agreement. There was some hope we might have gotten the papers first, but we decided not to pursue a time agreement.

As I understand it, under the Budget Act, we can, without debate, move to shorten the time. I hope that is not necessary. Many of us are prepared to vote right now—we do not have the papers, but without a lot of debate.

I think both Senator DOMENICI and Senator CHILES can respond to questions and others who are opposed to it want to be heard. I think we would save some time if we started now on an informal basis.

Mr. BUMPERS. Is that going to be the end of the legislative agenda when we finish with this?

Mr. DOLE. When this vote is taken, you are safe. The country is safe.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I am authorized to announce on behalf of the majority leader that he has two schedules for reconvening: Those who talk tonight come back on September 4; those who do not talk will come back on September 9. I guess that means I am going to have to come back on September 4. But clearly, I am not going to talk very long.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, I believe the House is voting now and we should have the papers shortly. I do want Senators who are not present and who might be listening to know that we do not intend to debate this matter very long. We have been at it so long that if the rest of my colleagues are not tired, I certainly am. But I am prepared for those who would like to inquire, either generally or specifically, what we propose in this budget resolution.

(Later the following occurred:)

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, while we have been debating the budget resolution that has not been called up, I ask unanimous consent to proceed to the conference report on Senate Concurrent Resolution 32, the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1986.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

FIRST CONCURRENT RESOLUTION ON THE BUDGET

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on Senate Concurrent Resolution 32.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the message from the House of Representatives.

(Conclusion of later proceedings.)

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I rise tonight in support of the conference report on Senate Concurrent Resolution 32, the first concurrent budget resolution for fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988.

That this conference report even comes to the Senate tonight, in my opinion, is a minor miracle. I must admit to my colleagues that I had serious doubts during this entire year about the possibility that we could get a budget resolution at all. As I said when we brought this budget to the floor of the Senate this past spring, the Senate Budget Committee performed an improbable legislative feat when it passed out, by 1 vote, a budget for this year.

I must admit that at times, I was pessimistic about the possibility of getting a budget for the Nation, a budget with real deficit reduction, but against what I consider to be overwhelming odds and overcoming a series of well-publicized events that I need not reiterate because they are well known personally by many and vicariously by everyone because of the publicity that surrounded them, but that would have doomed most other efforts, the Senate conferees are proud to bring to our Chamber tonight a conference agreement on the budget for the next 3 years to come.

This conference report contains the largest deficit reduction effort ever undertaken by the Congress. In fact, for those who want comparisons, it is the largest deficit reduction effort in the history of the Congress. That does not mean it ought to satisfy everyone, because we have a very strange situation. While this deficit reduction package is the largest, the deficits that they apply to are also the largest ever and clearly, the deficits that remain after this deficit reduction package will be extremely large in the opinion of the Senator from New Mexico for these times. It will save more than $276 billion from projected deficits during the next 3 years. Not even in the famous reconciliation effort of 1981 has the Congress been able to cut deficits by such a large amount at one fell swoop.

This conference report will reduce deficits in fiscal year 1986 alone by $55.5 billion. If the recommendations and mandates of this conference report are accepted and implemented entirely by the Congress, we will have deficits using the economics we started with some 3 months ago, of $112 billion by fiscal year 1988. This compares favorably to the goal this Senate set for itself 4 months ago of getting the 1988 deficit down to $100 billion.

I am not telling you that is what they will be; I am telling you that based upon this format, and this set of assumptions, that is what they are. Indeed, they could be substantially higher if any of the major economic components vary from those that we assumed.

Mr. President, at this time I ask unanimous consent that a table which summarizes the components of the deficit reduction portion of this conference report be made a part of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMPONENTS OF CONFERENCE SUBSTITUTE

[In billions of dollars]

	Fiscal year—			Total 1986 to 1988
	1986	1987	1988
SBC baseline deficit	227.4	244.7	243.6	715.7

Nondefense	−22.3	−30.3	−40.3	−92.8

Total deficit reduction	−55.5	−90.0	−130.7	−276.2
Deficit in conference substitute	171.9	154.7	112.9	439.5

Note.—Details may not add to totals due to rounding.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, the Senate-passed version reduced the deficit by $56.2 billion in the first year and had a $295 billion overall deficit reduction over the next 3 years.

Lest I give a false impression, let me say that I agree with almost everyone in this Chamber, whether they vote for or against this resolution, who would conclude that we should do more. This is merely a second step following last year's first step in what will be a long road toward balancing this Nation's fiscal accounts. And if major components of the fiscal budget continue to be left off the negotiating table, either by the Congress or by the President of the United States, then the road will indeed be very long. At least that is the opinion of the Senator from New Mexico.

The Senate conferees in a bipartisan move offered a much larger package of deficit reduction. One would have reduced it by $338 billion from the projected deficit in the next 3 years. It contained adjustments in the cost-of-living increases for Federal pension programs, modest revenue increases, and more domestic reforms than what I bring to you today. I believe that this Senate would have approved such a bold plan, but unfortunately, as all of us know, the White House and House of Representatives had serious problems with some of the elements in that package. I have said before that I think it was the best package and far better than what we have now.

But whether it is a mistake or not, it was rejected by those who have much to say about what we can do. Thus, many of those ingredients are not on the table. I think we have done the best we can with what is there, so all of that is history and hindsight and I do not want to dwell on it tonight. The fact is that the conference report which I bring to the Senate is the best that can be done under the circumstances. We were able to get more savings than we expected from the House conferees and we were able to impose more reconciliation than we thought. In this regard I would point out that this conference report mandates $67.1 billion in reconciliation spending savings, $8.4 billion in reconciled revenues. Those reconciliation savings will put almost every committee in the U.S. Senate to work upon their return to make some changes in the legislation that they have within their jurisdiction.

Some are entitlements, others direct spending, and yet others are authorizing legislation which would reduce the level that the appropriators are authorized to spend. It will not be easy. We will probably have a conference when both bodies do their work, a conference at which 250 to 300 Members of both bodies combined will be spread into a number of conferences to work out that bill.

Although that will be onerous, many of us think it is the most significant part of this budget and the most significant tool to force policy changes on the Congress of the United States, both in the House and the Senate.

I ask unanimous consent that a table summarizing these reconciliation savings made by the Senate committee be printed in the RECORD at this time.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. DOMENICI. I urge that those committees having jurisdiction, as indicated on the table that I have just inserted, be ready for their activities in the month of September because they will be charged with making changes in the laws within their jurisdiction to the tune and to the extent in dollars stated in each of the 3 years in the table which I have just inserted.

Let me talk for just a few moments as my last thoughts here.

I have heard some say that the budget process is not producing enough or that it cannot produce enough on time or that it is not getting deficits lower. I regret to say that, in my humble opinion, such talk ignores some realities, realities that some would like us to forget. We cannot ask the process to do more, whether it be the appropriation process, the budget process, the authorizing process, or any other. We cannot ask any of them to do more than the membership of this body and the other body is willing to do. When revenues and true entitlement changes were taken off the table during this conference, no process, no matter how ingenious, could have produced the savings that were lost.

We must be mature in our judgment. If the Congress will not act to cut deficits more, then no process will make up for that lack of will. If the President will not cooperate in areas that are absolutely vital for his support, then no Congress can be asked to do more.

The budget process brings the Senate tonight a realistic reflection of the collective judgment of the House and the Senate. And I say to those who want to do more that there is nothing in this resolution that precludes you from doing more. If you can find some way in the next 3 months as appropriation bills come, as authorizing bills come, as the debt limit rears its face in 2½ months, if you can find ways to do more and get 51 votes here and work its will on the U.S. House and get it signed by the President of the United States, I encourage you to try. I think there are a few items on which I would not join you if you make such an effort. I do not think very many of them will work, or at least I do not think they will work as well as the savings we are going to get here tonight when this budget is implemented. If we do nothing but rely on those other approaches, it is my honest opinion that we will get confusion, chaos, all kinds of bottlenecks, and when you add it up at the end of the year, I am not so sure you will come even close to these savings.

So it appears to me once again that this is realistic; it is the best we can do. Regardless of the system, regardless of the process, when we have the kind of activity that has taken place in the last 2½, 3 months with what we are left with on the table, I compliment the conferees from the House and the Senate and hope the Senate will pass this resolution.

Let me close with some specific information in some major areas. First, the Senate prevailed in the defense budget authority issue. Our numbers on budget authority are before us now, those that we voted in here that historic night when we passed the real courageous budget resolution. This conference report incorporates the Senate's authority levels and the estimated House levels for outlays in each of the 3 years for function 050, the defense function. This result validates the defense authorization bill that the Senate overwhelmingly approved earlier this week. I hope later to provide specific information on programmatic levels to the Senate but I do believe that for the time being, detailed reconciliation summaries that I have inserted in the RECORD should help Senators who wish to understand the very detailed assumptions that are made in this budget.

I also at this point ask unanimous consent that two charts, "Change From Senate Budget Committee Baseline" and "Change From Senate-Passed Budget Resolution" in each of the functions of Government, be made a part of the RECORD for the information of the Senate and those who use the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

And I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point a letter from the National Federation of Independent Businessmen supporting the budget resolution.

There being no objection, the information was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL FEDERATION OF INDEPENDENT BUSINESS,
August 1, 1985.

Hon. PETE V. DOMENICI,
Chairman, Senate Budget Committee, Washington, DC.

DEAR CHAIRMAN DOMENICI: On behalf of the membership of NFIB, comprising more than 500,000 small and independent businesses, I am writing you to indicate our support for the budget compromise the Budget Conferees have apparently worked out.

Earlier in the year NFIB set out five basic requirements for a budget proposal we could support. Using polls of our members as guidelines, we defined the following budget criteria: (1) deficit reduction of at least $50 billion in fiscal year 1986; (2) no new taxes; (3) a freeze on defense; (4) a freeze on Social Security COLAs; (5) preservation of an independent SBA. The budget you have achieved meets four out of these five criteria and therefore warrants our support.

While we congratulate you for your hard efforts, NFIB urges you to continue working toward two basic goals. First, we hope you will encourage your colleagues to pass authorizations on unreconciled portions of the budget as close to budget guidelines as possible. Second, we hope that the savings effected by this budget will be a first step in the long term project of balancing the budget. Efforts by the Congress to examine strategies for achieving this goal, and to reduce our huge national debt, will be of great benefit to our country and its economy.

Once again, NFIB commends you for your efforts and is pleased to support the Conference Report as a "Key Small Business Vote".

Sincerely,

JOHN J. MOTLEY III,
Director of Federal Legislation.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I believe that we, as Senators, fail to say a word of encouragement, to give a pat on the back, or simply to say, "Thank you," to those without whose help this legislative process would not work. I am speaking about our staffs, who put in long hours to make all of us look good and to make sure we know what we were doing.

I believe, with some obvious parochial pride, that we have as good a staff as there is on Capitol Hill, and in this case they have gone beyond the call of duty. Because we have been through so many different budgets that were on and off, that their work has been extremely difficult and the quantity has been astronomic.

I ask unanimous consent that the names of the majority staff of the Senate Budget Committee, with their positions, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the names were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Stephen E. Bell, Staff Director.
William Hoagland, Deputy Staff Director.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I would be remiss in my expressions of appreciation if I did not point out the excellent work of Senator CHILES' budget staff. Finally, the staff of the majority leader have worked with my committee staff throughout the long arduous meetings and preparation of this fiscal year 1986 budget resolution. Their help and guidance has been appreciated.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I rise in support of this conference agreement.

This is not a conference agreement that I would have started off wanting to support, and I do not think we can tell anybody that it does the job on the deficit. But it is the only program and the only opportunity we have now; and I think the only way we have to judge this is to ask whether this is better than no budget. When I look at it in that regard, this is better than no budget.

Within Congress and around the country, I think the deficit has now evolved as an understandable and dangerous issue that people want solved. I think they understand that there is a connection between deficits and interest rates and high trade deficits and the loss of jobs, the moving of our plants overseas. I believe that is a question that is becoming clearer and clearer to people. They know we need to get the deficit down.

We could have gotten the deficit down this time with the help of the White House and some of our leaders in the other House, but that was not to be. We did not get the help, but we found something else. I think we found a consensus in this body that spending cuts alone will not get it down. That is pretty helpful.

I believe we found a bipartisan spirit in this body as to how dangerous these deficits are, how it is going to take work on the part of everybody to get them down, and how you will have to look at every program in the Federal Government if you are going to get the deficit down.

You will have to look at every interest group in the Federal Government, and you will have to share the pain in all those interest groups if you are going to get the deficit down. You will have to look at revenues as well as the spending side if you are going to make a major cut.

This budget will reduce deficits substantially through reconciliation. That has always been important to the Senate. It is anathema to the House.

With respect to where we stand on reconciliation, I would give a couple of numbers. One, if you take out the COLA restraints—and we had to take those out—if you reduce those COLA restraints and then look at the Gorton-Chiles amendment, which was a compromise proposal put before the Budget Committee, which a lot of people wanted to support, it had about $72 billion in reconciliation. This has about $67 billion or $68 billion in deficit reconciliation.

Under the circumstances, I applaud the chairman and the work of the conferees in getting a product as good as this, given the fact that we lost the ability to work on anything on revenues or entitlement restraints.

Mr. President, one of the other things we have in this budget is that we have an understanding that was reached that we would not cut any of the poverty programs, any of the programs that affected those people who could not help themselves. That was a bipartisan agreement. It was an agreement made with the House. If you look at those programs you will see that they are not cut in this budget.

Mr. President, we have to ask ourselves what happens if we do not have a budget. We leave and go home for a month's recess. I think the people would perceive that Congress is being irresponsible.

We have to realize that we are a deliberative body, and there is one thing about a deliberative body—it is supposed to come to a conclusion. There are a lot of times I do not like the conclusion that is there. I would like to say that we will keep that from happening. But it seems to me that if you are going to be a deliberative body, you come down to the art of the possible, you come down to the responsibility of having to produce a product.

I believe the hour has come, the time has come, that we have to face up to that and determine whether or not we are going to produce that product or not. If we do not, then I feel that the people can well say:

> There is no way that bunch up there can do anything. They have been the problem in getting these deficits up. Now they won't do anything to put any kind of budget in effect, and we should have a plague on their Houses, both parties, both Houses.

I think they might well be right in making that determination.

Mr. President, if we do not have a budget, we will have another strategy, and I have heard that referred to as the veto strategy. That is the strategy that says:

> We in the White House will run against that irresponsible Congress. We will show them that we can control spending, that we do not have to worry about them having a budget. We don't have to worry about them because we will make them responsible and we will control the spending.

Mr. President, I know there are people who have advocated that strategy. They have said:

> That is better for us politically. We should have that strategy. It will make our President look good. We can show the House as being the big spenders.

Mr. President, when you consider the chaos that could result from that kind of strategy, I think that the public, before it was over, would say:

> A pox on all of them. Why in the world do they have that kind of wrangling? Why in the world are they doing that?

Frankly, I do not want to give the President that kind of veto strategy. After he has been the one who kept us from getting a good budget, torpedoed plan after plan that we had, I do not want him now to be able to sit on top and say:

> Look at what I'm doing. I'm making them do right. I'm making them save money. I'm making them not spend.

To me that would be the height of folly for us to allow him to have that, sort of have his cake and eat it, too.

Mr. President, if we have no budget resolution, item veto or impoundment certainly could be attached or likely could be attached to the debt ceiling bill. If we have no resolution, by the same token, that strategy I do not think would work because there would be no control against new spending increases.

So regardless of this it would be a great show of the veto at the same time; on the other hand, you would see new programs start and we see that veto strategy works until something is pretty popular. When something comes down that is pretty popular there is no veto and has not been any veto around here. We have seen that happen many times.

I think we could see that at the end of that process we would see we adopted new sending programs, and we would see there would be no reconciliation because without this instrument, there is no way of instructing those committees to go back and get savings. So that $68 billion that we are talking about in reconciled savings, those would be gone. If you had a veto of every project that came before us, you still would not get those savings.

Also, Mr. President, remember if there is no budget, then points of order lie against all of the appropriations bills.

The Senator from Florida has made himself pretty unpopular in the body before by standing on the floor and raising points against the appropriations bills when we had no budget. That is not a very pleasant thing for me to do or anyone else.

The way to not have that is to follow the law that we have adopted that we have set forth and see that that would not happen.

There are those in here who care about tax reform. I can tell you that if we do not have a budget we certainly would not have tax reform. You would not even be able to see that taken up in this Congress.

This product, as we have said before, is not great, but it is certainly better than nothing. It would cut deficits $29 billion in 1986, it would cut deficits by $200 billion over the 3 years, and then it reconciles $68 billion on domestic programs.

Mr. President, I think this budget is better in its priorities than the budget that was passed by the Senate earlier on before we went to conference. That budget basically cut domestic programs about two-thirds to what defense programs were cut. This one is very close to a one-to-one ratio. It cuts defense about $86 billion. It cuts domestic programs $93 billion. So basically now you are getting down to a one-to-one cut.

We would have a budget in place. We would be able to hold off new increases and I think again if we have the will in this body, down the hall, and down the street, then we set the stage for future action and hopefully we would be able to take that action.

Certainly, we need to do that. We would have to have a change in some of the thinking. We would have to recognize that we do need revenue. We would have to recognize that we would have to be willing to put all the programs on the table. Maybe that is something that can happen.

I think that the pluses far outweigh the minuses. The fact that we now have a constituency for going further and trying to do that in this body, and we have seen that constituency grow during this debate on this conference report, I think that has been very healthy.

Mr. President, I urge that we adopt the resolution.

Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the conference report on the first fiscal year 1986 budget resolution. In so doing, I am not implying any criticism of the efforts of the chairman of the Budget Committee, nor the majority leader. I believe that Senators DOMENICI, DOLE, and CHILES, and others on both sides of the aisle, have done yeoman work in trying to produce a budget resolution which would lead to meaningful reductions in the Federal deficit over the long term. Unfortunately, due to factors beyond their control, they failed.

Mr. President, the record budget deficits that the Federal Government has incurred over the last few years, and apparently will continue to run up, represents the single most pressing problem facing the President, Congress, and the American people. These deficits are already causing serious dislocations within the economy since they are primarily responsible for the continued high interest rates, the high value of the dollar, and the increasing U.S. trade deficit.

There has been much breast beating in recent months about unfair competition from imports; yet, how much of a problem would there really be if the dollar were not overvalued by as much as 35 percent? We see that farmers are having trouble getting credit and that whatever credit is available costs too much. Yet, how much of a problem would that be if the Federal Government's credit demands were not so excessive?

It was in this context that the Senate, on May 9, surprised the skeptics and passed a historic budget resolution calling for a $56 billion reduction in the Federal deficit in fiscal 1986 alone and $295 billion in savings over the next 3 years.

The Senate resolution accomplished this by making significant savings in the President's Defense Program, eliminating the automatic cost-of-living adjustments in most Federal entitlement programs, cutting or eliminating a number of discretionary programs, and freezing most other discretionary programs at the fiscal 1985 level. The prospects on May 9 for meaningful action on the deficit appeared very bright.

Although the vote on the final Senate package was close, that did not particularly concern me. Many of those who voted against the Senate package showed their support for strong action on the budget by voting for well-conceived alternatives, notably the substitute offered by Senators CHILES and HOLLINGS and the one by Senators GRASSLEY and BIDEN. Few people realize it, given the partisan rhetoric surrounding much of the debate on the budget, but 81 Senators, including two-thirds of the Democrats in this body, voted to cut at least half of the 1986 Social Security cost-of-living adjustment.

Within that total, 68 Senators, including 40 percent of the Democrats, voted to do away with the 1986 cost-of-living adjustment entirely, and if anyone doubts those figures I suggest they go back and check the RECORD.

Notwithstanding this, the Senate now finds itself faced with a conference report which accomplishes little. How can that be?

The bottom line, quite frankly, is that the President and the majority leadership of the House of Representatives have agendas in which the budget deficit problem, notwithstanding their rhetoric, does not rank very high. The position of the House leadership is clear. The most important item on their budget agenda is to prevent any restriction on statutory automatic cost-of-living adjustments in any entitlement program, no matter how limited.

Their apparent hope is that the Republicans will initiate this action, which even most Democrats in the Senate supported, so that they can turn it into an issue in the next campaign and talk about the Republicans who wanted to hurt the elderly of this country. Agenda item No. 2 is to protect every domestic program in the Federal Government's inventory, no matter how wasteful or inefficient it may be. The American public ought to be astounded that the House Democratic budget resolution did not call for the elimination of even one program in fiscal 1986. Among the thousands of Federal programs, they could not agree that one was sufficiently devoid of merit to justify its elimination. If that is not an endorsement of the status quo, I do not know what is.

Given the House's unwillingness to make more than minimal additional cuts in defense beyond what the Senate did, anyone with a basic grasp of arithmetic can figure out the only remaining option to address the deficit: Raise revenue. But, the House decided against that.

Instead, they resorted to a variety of gimmicks and accounting tricks to give the appearance of addressing the deficit. That, however, does not do the job and it will not fool the American people. Dealing with the Federal budget deficit clearly is not an item on the House Democratic leadership's agenda.

The administration is just as weak on the deficit. As has become crystal clear over the last couple of months, it is difficult to find reducing the deficit on the list of administration budget priorities, other than their rhetorical priorities. At the top of the list is an unwillingness to consider any measure which will lead to a revenue increase. Parenthetically, it is ironic to note that they failed to even propose a revenue neutral tax reform plan, notwithstanding their frequent statements to the contrary. The administration now concedes their tax reform plan will lose in excess of $11 billion in revenue over the next 5 years alone, with higher losses in subsequent years, and that assumes enactment of a retroactive recapture provision which will raise $60 billion.

Second, the administration is determined to keep as much money following through the Defense Department as possible. While I share the President's view that maintaining national security is probably the most important function of the Federal Government, the administration's attitude has resembled the House leadership's position on domestic programs: if the money is for defense, it cannot be bad. Third, the administration is determined to avoid exercising any leadership on cost-of-living adjustments, an attitude similar to that of the House leadership on taxes. It is then, after taking the entire revenue side of the equation off the table and three-quarters of the spending side, that they want action against the deficit. That does not, somehow, strike me as a commitment reducing the deficit.

But, the administration's impact on the budget deliberations in Congress were worse then benign. When it finally began to look like the Senate, under the leadership of Senators DOLE and DOMENICI, was making progress in conference with the House, the administration pulled the rug out from under negotiations. They did this without a word of warning to the very same Senators who had done so much, in some cases at considerable political risk, to secure enactment of as much of the administration's program as possible.

This may seem like a trite statement, but successful action against the deficit requires a focus on the deficit. The reason is quite simple. Every dollar spent by the Federal Government and every dollar not collected in revenue due to a tax deduction or credit has a constituency which will argue that such money in question is critical to the national welfare. Reducing the deficit means, by definition, taking a series of steps, each of which will offend some individuals or organizations.

To the extent the attention of the President and Congress are focused on deficit reduction, these constituencies have little room to maneuver. But as soon as attention is divided and diffused, whether it be with tax reform, South Africa sanctions, or whatever, it becomes much easier for these narrowly focused constituencies to operate. And, as soon as the President, who is after all the leader of the Government, shows his lack of concern for the deficit, Congress will begin to cave to these particularized pressures. In fact, I saw this scenario at work yesterday in the Senate Appropriations Committee's markup. A budget-busting amendment was passed 17 to 9, although the Senate voted to table a similar amendment during floor consideration of the budget resolution with Appropriations Committee members voting 15 to 14 to table.

The President and the House majority leadership have succeeded in creating a situation where meaningful deficit reduction will not occur in 1985 for sure, and possibly not for the remainder of President Reagan's term in office. The conference report eliminates the Senate's proposed restraints on cost-of-living adjustments. It eliminates the House's proposed restraints on defense. It eliminates most of the domestic program cuts proposed by the Senate. And no new savings are offered as a replacement. The dollar savings in this conference report consist of those reductions in the President's defense program approved by the Senate, a freeze on most domestic discretionary programs at the fiscal 1985 level, and little else. This conference report will ensure deficits in excess of $180 billion range, or higher, in fiscal 1986 and probably for several years to come, if we are lucky.

Certainly, nobody should be fooled by the deficits estimated in the conference report before us. One can start with the fact that the impact of the defense program approved by the conference report is $22 billion low. The conferees took the Senate passed defense program, but simply reduced the cost estimate by $22 billion with the stroke of a pen, with the consent of the Defense Department. It appears that the conference report assumes the inclusion of all State and local employees in the Social Security Program, An assumption that many would argue is unconstitutional since it involves the Federal Government imposing a tax on State and local governments. This conference report has not been before the Senate long enough to give it a thorough examination, but I feel confident in asserting that there are other similar unrealistic assumptions.

On top of everything else, the conference report understates the deficit because it uses overly optimistic economic assumptions, in particular the assumption that there will be 4 percent annual real growth in the economy.

There was speculation that 4 percent was too optimistic when the Senate passed the budget resolution in early May. We know it now. I would probably be able to live with understating the projected deficits in this way, if it was a budget resolution that would make a real dent. I cannot live with it in the context of a budget resolution which accomplishes so little.

While the economy appears sound today, the combination of record budget deficits, record trade deficits and the resulting decline in the manufacturing sector of the economy, the overvalued dollar, high real interest rates, and a reliance on foreign capital to finance U.S. credit needs is inherently unstable. The failure to take serious action to reduce the deficit, and thereby move against these structural imbalances, will lead to a recession of the type this country has not experienced in years. And, if Congress cannot reduce the deficit when the economy is in decent shape, how will it be able to do so in the midst of a recession?

Supporters of the conference report argue that the minimal steps called for by the conference report are better than nothing. I strongly disagree. In fact, most of the minimal steps in this budget resolution can and probably will be followed even in the absence of an adopted conference report. I believe this conference report is a surrender to the deficit. I cannot vote for it and, come next fall, I will not support the increase in the Federal debt ceiling which will be necesssary to accommodate the outrageous deficits which are coming.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join with me in voting against the budget resolution.

Mr. President, I will conclude by simply saying this: After 7 months of blood, sweat, and tears, we have come to this sorry state. I yield the floor.

(Mr. TRIBLE assumed the Chair.)

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I will try to be as brief as possible. What makes you take any time at all is the historical approach to what we have been trying to do now for the past 3 to 4 years. We knew immediately after we passed Reaganomics in 1981 that we were in serious trouble.

I relate back to that particular time when we passed a budget on August 13, 1981. Incidentally, I had been the ranking member of the Budget Committee at that particular time and cosponsored with Senator DOMENICI the $35.4 billion spending cut package. Although we passed it on August 13, by September 24, President Ronald Reagan was on national TV saying we are going to have to raise taxes. Of course, we did not. Dave Stockman came out with the Trojan horse article about the trickle-down theory. The President and the White House then got their nose out of joint.

The word was, "Look, this is a Carter budget. After all, the President hasn't even had a chance to submit anything." And even though he was elected on what he submitted, they said, "Wait until January." So from January 1982 until August 1985, we tried to control this runaway horse of growing deficits.

With that in mind, I went to Howard Baker, then the majority leader, submitted a resolution that would appoint a joint committee to study the growing deficit problem. The committee would make recommendations to the President on how to get these deficits under control. They would be shared sacrifices across the board that would be fair to all.

The rest is history with respect to the President's approach to this particular responsibility. He submitted a budget that was voted down in the Budget Committee by a vote of 17 to 4. The Republicans on the committee did not like to vote against the President. I did not like to vote against the President. But it called for $200 billion deficits.

In January, in a bipartisan approach, the Senator from North Dakota, the Senator from Nebraska, the Senator from Mississippi, and myself circulated a "Dear Colleague" letter that consisted across-the-board freeze on spending and a freeze on tax expenditures.

That received four votes in the Budget Committee, but we began at that particular time on the very premise that not only was it necessary but it was politically attainable. I emphasize it was politically attainable. If you were a mayor of a city in any hometown in America and you could not print dollars like we do here in Washington, you would call together the city council and say, "No one is really suffering, we are doing pretty good, we are trying to allow the economy a chance to bounce back, so let us just hold the line 1 more year." This was the budget President Reagan ran on and been reelected overwhelmingly. This was the budget that had received three readings in the House last year, three readings in the Senate, signed into law. So we were not worried about it being politically attainable. We were worried about the will here in the national Congress.

We made progress in this particular budget process. We had Senator DOMENICI, Senator CHILES, Congressman GRAY and Congressman LATTA working around the clock, all in good spirit trying to put together a particular budget under the circumstances. On that score they received the gratitude of all of us. They have done as good a job as can be done under those circumstances. But they were not the circumstances that would lead to real deficit reduction, and we in essence have missed a golden opportunity.

Throughout January, February, and March you could not mention Social Security. By April we had frozen Social Security. We had a majority of Democrats on this side of the aisle to do it. In January, February, and March, you could not mention defense to the President as a means to reduce the deficit. Senator STENNIS, the expert on national defense in the Congress, had joined in our bipartisan freeze which included defense. We were voting for a freeze with no growth except for inflation. We froze social programs and made some additional cuts. By the July 4 break, in a bipartisan submission of a majority of the Senate conferees we submitted just that: the Gorton-Chiles across-the-board freeze, a shared sacrifice. I talked to Chairman GRAY. He was working diligently, and thought we could make some progress. We were really encouraged. we were not in a logjam.

A real deficit reduction package was now at the table. Unfortunately it was derailed. The distinguished Congressman from New York, JACK KEMP, went to the White House to talk to Don Regan. He convinced the President's Chief of Staff that we were in a logjam. We were not. It was a bad representation. I attended all the budget meetings. We were making progress. We were not in a logjam.

He further convinced Mr. Regan to convince President Reagan that the only way to get us out of the logjam was to go back on Social Security. When we returned from the July 4 break the President commented that we have to do something about the deficit. However, the President emphasized tax reform like that was the priority need of this Government.

We met only last Friday morning, and the subject the President wanted to discuss was tax reform and not the deficit. The President said that when Congress comes back, I will get those conferees over and talk to them like a Dutch uncle. We are going to make them know we are really going to have to do something about the deficit.

In the meantime, with the Kemp-Regan message to President Reagan, the President determined, wait a minute, before I get those conferees together at 11 o'clock on Wednesday morning I had better get the House leadership and Senate leadership over for a conference about this logjam, Social Security, and defense, because the word had been put out, and the thing was pretty well arranged so that when President Reagan and Speaker O'NEILL got out under the tree by themselves, the Speaker said, Mr. President, if you take my Social Security, I will take your defense. And the President in essence says that is a good deal and we will not pay for it. There will be no revenues.

So what they did was take the $9 billion increase in budget authority for defense which is in this particular measure here today, and the $7.5 billion on COLA's—for the total of 17.4 that we are going to add to the deficit, and we are not going to pay for it. There will be no revenues.

That put us in gridlock. And through the genius of PETE DOMENICI, we now have that double COLA idea. Well, the distinguished majority leader in the House, Mr. WRIGHT, believes in the classic COLA, Mr. DOMENICI believes in the double COLA, and this Senator believes in the diet COLA. So we are into the COLA fight here in this U.S. Congress. But through the genius of PETE DOMENICI, he came up with a double COLA. I thought that was fanciful. But in any event, it changed the framework, and got us back into conversation.

I talked to leaders such as our distinguished friend, the Senator from Nevada, PAUL LAXALT, Senator DOLE and others and said we really ought to get you leaders together. It was leadership in a way that got us off track. Do not bother about the conferees. Get the leaders together, and then let us go back to the White House where you can all walk out at one time, not seeing who is going to blink first, but all blink together.

Politically, that was the only way it was done. To this dismay of those who were going over to the Speaker's office, when they got there, they got called. Mr. Reagan and Mr. Speaker had already announced that there would be no change, that they would insist on increases in Social Security and other COLA's; they would insist on the increases in defense. So what you have is a patchwork done here as best it can be done.

I say patchwork advisedly. That is what the poor chairman on the House side had to do. That is what took all the time. All day yesterday he would have to run to this chairman, "What will you take here and what will you take there?" What will a particular chairman take to get this particular budget and these particular votes? The environment of crisis and need did not pertain. We have a budget resolution developed by House chairmen—chairmen who never saw a dollar they could not spend.

I can tell you that the environment that is controlling this deficit persists here in the Nation's Capital but not out in the hinterland.

Out in the countryside, Mr. President, everyone fairly understands that we have now gotten by the election last year when we should have done something, when 38 Senators in an election year voted to freeze, freeze, freeze. And to add revenues in an election year, including the majority of Democrats in this body. That is how they felt the teeth on their backs. They wanted to be responsible. The proof of the pudding is there. The Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Michigan who voted for a freeze both ran for reelection and won because they had the votes for fiscal integrity and responsibility.

Let me say on that particular point we have been totally mesmerized and misled on Social Security.

If you go up to the distinguished Senator from Maine, they will tell you, "Do not come up here running for office unless you leave alone any kind of import oil fee. If you go for the import oil fee, we use oil that is 95 percent imported and it will run up the heating bills of every voter and you will be swaying at the polls."

Interestingly, to show how we get the wrong word down here in this national kind of politically incubative Congress, Senator GARY HART ran on a $10 a barrel import oil fee, and he took Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut. He went through the whole of New England with the Democratic vote.

There is no question in my mind that similarly we have all been hung up on the mantle of Social Security. Nobody is cutting it. We are just asking the recipients—and I mean those who do not have need, because we have always provided COLA's for those at the poverty level and 10 percent above it—to hold off for 1 year. And we were careful not to shove anyone into poverty.

We did not have COLA's under President Lyndon Johnson. We had a good Democrat. We did not have COLA's under President Kennedy. He was a good Democrat. Incidentally, President Johnson did balance the budget. But we were mesmerized by that.

Now we have missed the opportunity. The opportunity here was not for Speaker O'NEILL to join President Reagan, but, rather, join the majority of Republicans and Democrats in this Congress.

I have a pretty good feel for legislative bodies. I served 10 years in a State legislature and 19 years here. After 29 years I have a pretty good nose and smell on political and legislative trends. A majority of the Republicans and Democrats in this Congress are ready, willing and prepared to do their duty, to face up to the responsibility and bite the bullet now. They have been prevented from doing so because of President Reagan on the one hand upsetting the apple cart, and, more than anything else, Speaker O'NEILL running down the Social Security road, with his leader JIM WRIGHT sitting there at every one of the conferences. "But the veto, the veto," We heard more about the veto and what the White House was going to do than the White House ever told us.

He was not afraid of the veto; he was enjoying the veto. The chairman knows it and I know it.

So we were told how we were concerned and worried. There was not any worrying. They were just ramming home an impossible situation, where in this body, by a majority vote, as cited by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire a while ago, joined together for a freeze on Social Security. But over on the House side this real concern about grappling with the deficit has never been exhibited.

When TIP misrepresented what he did, he went back and they went with him.

Senator DOMENICI can talk for the Republicans. Two-thirds of the Republicans voted with Senator DOMENICI. We ought to get that on the record.

So, TIP had the thought of going pell-mell down the road to victory. He was going to say that to senior citizens and all—we saved the COLA. Of course, he won't admit he saved it at the expense of all sound reason and fiscal responsibility toward all citizens.

But we have a far, far greater responsibility here than just being true to our senior citizens. The truth is that we are untrue to the senior citizens and all citizenry when we go along with this particular budget. We missed that opportunity. If we had ever gotten together and gotten a majority going, what you would really have had would be a bipartisan congressional budget. We could have come out with revenues and Social Security, minimum defense figures, and all the cuts. We would have come with the cuts. We really would have done the job.

Selfishly now, just talking in a partisan fashion for Democrats, we would have been released from the fiscal cancer that we suffer over this land of Democrats always wanting to spend and spend and spend.

We have earned that particular perception by constantly doing just that. They do not want to sacrifice. It the Democrat leaders had led for that sacrifice, we would have had it on this side and we would have had it in the House. We would have solved the problem this year.

What happens when you adopt this budget. I think the Senate should be fully informed that they are not solving anything. What we are doing here is suffering from battle fatigue. We are trying to get something done so we can have a lift in August and go on our trips and smile and say, "It is only a process. We cannot control processes and human nature. Under the process, we have done the best we can." Then go out and enjoy ourselves.

What happens? What really happens, if nothing changes between now and next year, is you are committed to a horrible deficits for as far as one can see. You are committed by this particular vote until August of next year when we will be struggling with the 1987 budget resolution.

When you come back on August 1 of next year you are committed to 3- percent real growth in defense. That is over and above inflation.

The Department of Defense is using a 4.7-percent inflation this year. They will use over 7 percent with increased inflation by next year.

You are committed to this increase, to keep your commitment for 3- percent real growth. This adds $25 billion to this year's totals. You are committed to COLA's, which will be at least another $10 billion add-on and probably more. That is $35 billion. You are committed, since you gave us a dificit of $190 billion to $200 billion, to another $30 billion jump in interest costs. That adds up to a $65 billion add-on.

You get another $12 billion increase due to health costs; you cannot divert them, there is no way in the world. If you can hold that kind of cap, you are lucky. That is $77 billion. And of course, add food stamps, veterans and a few other little things, and you have $80 billion. So you have on the one hand committed to spending the $80 billion in the next year, and what are you going to do? You are going back with no revenues and you are going to have to cut your program further.

And that, to me, is the Reagan designed program. That has always been his design. We have tried to emphasize it at every turn for the last 4 or 5 years, that President Reagan really believes that deficits are the only way to control congressional spending. He does not state it in words, but he states it in actions. He says, "Look, they are going to start new programs and do this and do that, and the only kind of discipline or control that I can put on that spending engine across there on Capitol Hill is to have these $190-$200 billion deficits so that when TIP O'NEILL and FRITZ HOLLINGS get together, they talk about how to cut spending rather than how to start new programs."

I think the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. MOYNIHAN] will come and cite Tom Wicker's article in the paper and the economist Pyatt, who was told by a top economist of the Reagan administration that that is exactly why a man, grown, mature, and responsible as the President is, would do such a thing.

So we fall politically into the trap of running higher deficits and continuing them on, to what? Not to just cut spending, but to eliminate Government.

The gentleman in the White House is of the western mentality. He developed in the wild and woolly West the idea that it was developed without social security, without welfare, without food stamps, and without education. And if they did it that way, then the whole country can do it that way. And that is what the President came East to do. To dismantle this bureaucracy on the Potomac.

Of course, we down in the South know that is not quite the case on how to run Government. We tried it for 100 years in the State of South Carolina without a central government and thereupon mutually pledged each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor. So we are the ones who tried it for 100 years without these programs and forming this Nation, one Nation indivisible, we think we have done pretty well.

I agree with the President's attempt to discipline, but now it has gotten to the point of folly. What he has done now is cause us to do this: We have put out a fraudulent budget.

I say a fraudulent budget because they will tell you in Gant versus Coca Cola, 172 South Carolina at page 28, that is one that we learned as freshmen in law school, that to be fraud, it must be false, it must be material, it must be depended upon, that they did depend upon it, they were defrauded, and damage was caused—I say to my distinguished friend from Maine.

Here is what they are doing in this agreement. First, they start off with false OMB figures. Dave Stockman came over with his OMB figures and he sold that to the House.

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. DOLE. May I interrupt the Senator to pass the adjournment resolution? The House people want to go home.

Mr. HOLLINGS. If the Senator wants me to yield to do that, I will, but I am going to finish in just a minute.

Mr. DOLE. Then I shall wait.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I shall try my best.

We have these fraudulent figures. I was very interested in the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee saying, just this afternoon, that we need reports from the Congressional Budget Office—we need CBO figures. But Stockman gave us these figures, got the Senate to use them. They got the House to use Stockman figures.

When Stockman is going up to Salomon Bros, he goes up to the stock market and says, "Man, they were so fraudulent that if the SEC were overseeing us and the figures we used, they would send us all to jail." Thereupon, the Washington Post finally found out they were fraudulent and the New York Times and Time magazine and Newsweek. Senator EXON and I had three new conferences talking about the nature of these fraudulent figures. You could not get anyone's attention. They would not listen that they were fraudulent.

Well, even a blind hog picks up a acorn. We finally have their attention on these false figures. And if we use CBO estimates, we add $9 billion to this so-called cut—well, add the $9 billion onto the deficit of $172 billion in the agreement. That will make it $181 billion. The 1 percent decrease in the GNP that has also not been figured into the total. And now the administration says in order to maintain the 3-percent annual GNP rate, we would have to have, in the last two quarters, 5 percent real growth and anybody thinks in industry, nobody thinks that in the financial market.

What we have is a very fraudulent base in the resolution. There are many phony things lying around here. Take a look at some of them. Agricultural savings, we asked and we have now at the present time over a 3-year period a $45 billion cut from the baseline for agriculture. The conference report says cut it to $39 billion, but the majority leader told us this morning that the Agriculture Committee—and those on the committee can tell me—are talking about increases in the tens of billions of dollars. We know we have over a billion dollars in agriculture unreconciled. You won't achieve it if it's not reconciled and the Agriculture Committee is proving that point.

The Outer Continental Shelf issue is another one. These are law cases to be settled mostly between the States and the Federal Government. They will be lucky to get that over there.

We factored in Conrail, a saving of $1.2 billion. A majority in the House and Senate feels at this moment it is not going to pass, but we have it in this conference report.

Civil service, we have already frozen the pay of Government employees. They do not think they are going to put on top of a pay freeze, a 2-percent increase on their Social Security and retirement taxes.

Medicare revenue is another $1 billion to $2 billion. I can go down the list about the States going under. Whether or not that happens, there is a $600 million figure for Eximbank. We are not talking about selling loan assets of the Government, but the House is. I have been at the conference and they still are. That is not going to happen.

Mass transit is not reconciled and Amtrak and public housing, while it is reconciled, there is some debt forgiveness trickery in that particular one.

I could go down the others, Mr. President, but returning to my point I think there are phony savings of $7 billion to $10 billion easily there. So what you have instead of a $55 billion cut, it is nearer $37 billion. If you luck out instead of ending up with a deficit of $172 billion, Mr. President, you end up with a defict of $192 billion, perhaps more nearly $200 billion.

Last year, in October, the President, running for office, stood up and said, "We have estimated a deficit of $175 billion for this year, 1985." Now, today, they have it to $213 billion, but with the 1-percent drop in the gross national product, that is bound to go to 223, 225. So instead of 175, we are now running at a $225 billion deficit of $50 billion greater than projected only nine months ago. I ask the distinguished Senator to put bets with me: They would take the 172, I would take the 192 or 200 and I bet anybody in the Senate I come out closer; you pick the odds.

They do not believe it and they should not believe it. This year, in reality, we should be putting the pressure on at this point to create the environment that will make us act.

Maybe in August, if the bond market will go down 10 points, we can come back here in September on the debt limit bill and develop a real second concurrent resolution. We have the right under this conference report to do it. I would urge that happen so that we can attack the deficit this year, because—as I have told my colleagues—we will have deficits next year of $200 billion. And you are going into an election year with even more increases in Social Security, defense, interest costs, and everything else. They cannot be avoided.

It will be even more difficult to bring the deficit down. What we really need is responsibility and leadership. I am distressed that we have not developed it here in this particular debate. People are ready for the resolution so they can go home on their vacations, and more power to them. But we in the Congress will finally realize that we cannot have our cake and eat it, too.

Yes, go ahead, vote for it tonight. We have been doing this for 3 years running. But you come back next July and look around and see exactly where you have put yourself and this country. I do not think that is responsible. I know a majority do not want to do it. As a result, I did not sign the conference report, and I urge my colleagues to sincerely, not politically but on the fiscal basis alone, reject it. We should not heed any words about what the President is going to veto. This is a congressional concurrent resolution. We have known all Presidents were snookering us. They would always put in there the cut on veterans, knowing we would put it back. They would always cut impact aid knowing we in Congress would put it back. That is why we started 10 years ago the budget process, to get away from the maneuvers of the executive branch and get a concurrent budget resolution from the House and Senate. It is our responsibility. Do not tell us about vetoes. If we have a bipartisan, across-the-board freeze, including those revenues, I can tell you here and now the President would be isolated and he would be in a very difficult position to veto it. But at least we would have done our work and given this country heart.

I thank the distinguished majority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to transfer all time on the conference report to the amendment in disagreement.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, so the Senators that are listening will know what the floor manager's thoughts are on further debate, unless there are questions of the chairman, I have no further comments to make on the budget resolution.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I have a question. This may have already been answered, but I have not heard it said. Will the distinguished chairman indicate whether or not the President supports this resolution?

Mr. DOMENICI. Perhaps I ought to yield to the distinguished majority leader on that. I have not been in communication. I do not know whether he has or not.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I think it is fair to say that the President feels this is a step in the right direction.

Mr. DOMENICI. Might I say to the distinguished minority leader, I yielded because I knew he would answer it that way.

Mr. BYRD. I will shortly be casting a vote one way or the other on this resolution. If the President supports it, I would like to vote for it.

Mr. President, I would like to support this conference report, but if the President is going to at some future time criticize the Congress, and particularly those of us on this side of the aisle, for having supported this resolution, I might regret that I had cast my vote for it. It would be too late at that point. And there may be other votes over here, may I say.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am not certain what the President will say, but I have had an opportunity to visit with the President today and we did discuss the budget resolution. He did indicate that there were probably things that he would prefer. I believe I can say safely that the President will not criticize those who vote for it.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished majority leader or someone on the other side of the aisle try to get an answer from the White House before we cast our vote? I want to vote for this resolution, but I would like first to know whether or not the President of the United States supports this budget conference report.

Mr. DOLE. I think I have made it clear—perfectly clear we used to say. The President will indicate after passage of the conference report, assuming it passes, that he thinks it is a step in the right direction. I think he may even indicate that he would have preferred the Senate-passed measure on May 10, but I can assure the Senator from West Virginia, my good friend and supporter of this conference report, hopefully, that the President feels it is a step in the right direction. I think that is fairly definite. It is definite.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I still ask the distinguished majority leader if he or someone on his side who is on good speaking terms with the President can find out whether or not he supports this resolution. I know that he might like something different. I would, also.

Mr. DOLE. Let me check on that. [Laughter.]

Mr. BYRD. I thank the majority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no time remaining on the conference report. All time was transferred to the amendment.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The House recedes from its amendment and concurs therein with a further amendment.

MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

AUTOMATIC SECOND BUDGET RESOLUTION

SEC. 3(a). If the Congress has not completed action by October 1, 1985, on the concurrent resolution on the budget required to be reported under section 310(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for fiscal year 1986, then, for purposes of section 311 of such Act, this concurrent resolution shall be deemed to be the concurrent resolution required to be reported under section 310 of such Act.

(b) In the House of Representatives, section 311(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as made applicable by subsection (a) of this section, shall not apply to bills, resolutions, or admendments within the jurisdiction of a committee, or any conference report on any such bill or resolution, If—

(1) the enactment of such bill or resolution as reported;

(2) the adoption and enactment of such amendment; or

(3) the enactment of such bill or resolution in the form recommended in such conference report; would not cause the appropriate allocation for such committee of new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority as described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 made pursuant to section 302(a) of such Act for fiscal year 1986 to be exceeded.

TAX REFORM

SEC. 4. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) the existing tax structure of the United States distorts economic activity, leading to an inefficient use of national resources and a weakening of our domestic economic vitality and competitive posture in international markets;

(2) the relative tax burdens among various taxpayer categories are manifestly unfair insofar as they arise from differences in the capabilities of taxpayers to take advantage of complicated tax laws;

(3) the ability of the Federal Government to plan and conduct rational fiscal policy is frustrated by elaborate schemes to avoid taxation and the unintended effects of tax incentives and penalties;

(4) progressive erosion of voluntary compliance threatens the fiscal integrity of our public finances and the confidence of our citizens in the Federal Government's capacity to govern; and

(5) a number of plans, each designed to simplify and reform the Tax Code, have been before the Congress for a time sufficient to allow for extensive analysis and evaluation.

(b) It is therefore the sense of the Congress that tax reform should be adopted as soon as possible, and that it should incorporate the following principles and objectives:

(1) efficiency and responsiveness to market conditions in the economic activities of American businesses and consumers;

(2) simplicity of structure and lower marginal tax rates;

(3) a fair and equitable distribution of the tax burden among all taxpayers, with relief for those below the poverty level, and incentive to bring them into the work force;

(4) a broader tax base, with deductions essential to avoid genuine hardship or to protect the economic security of the American people; and

(5) increased incentives for work, saving, and investment.

CBO SCOREKEEPING REQUIREMENTS

SEC. 5. It is the sense of the Senate that because the Senate requires timely reporting of legislative action on spending bills, and because the Senate requires continual control over the budget, the Director of the Congressional Budget Office shall issue a weekly report during periods when the Senate is in session detailing and tabulating the progress of congressional action on bills and resolutions providing new budget authority and changing revenues and the public debt for a fiscal year, including, but not limited to the requirements set forth in Public Law 93-344, section 308(b).

FARM LOSS DEDUCTION

SEC. 6. It is the sense of the Senate that revenues should be increased and it is assumed that tax legislation will be enacted to limit to the national median family income the amount of farm loss which may be deducted against nonfarm income, and it is further assumed that revenues derived from enactment of such legislation be used to reduce individual income tax rates and to assure that full-time, family-size farm operators will not be disadvantaged by unfair competition from high-income taxpayers with substantial nonfarm income.

ENHANCED TAX LAW ENFORCEMENT

SEC. 7. It is the sense of the Congress that revenues should be increased and it is assumed that the Committees on Finance and Ways and Means will develop legislation to reduce the tax enforcement gap, estimated by the Internal Revenue Service at $92,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1986. It is further assumed that such legislation should provide for increased and improved enforcement and collection, through audits, examinations, and other steps designed to identify and eliminate tax cheating and increase revenue collections from individuals and corporations currently evading Federal taxes, and that the legislation should include steps designed to increase voluntary compliance with tax laws and that such steps may include increased staff for taxpayer assistance, speedier processing of returns and provision of public information designed to build public trust and understanding of Internal Revenue Service enforcement efforts and that such legisation should also provide that the resources of the Internal Revenue Service shall be increased to accomplish full enforcement of United States tax laws, increasing voluntary compliance.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY CONFERENCE

SEC. 8. It is the sense of the Congress that the Administration should consider convening a high level meeting of the major industrial countries for the express purpose of exploring options to improve the functioning of the international monetary system, including measures to stablize currency exchange rates, reduce interest rates, promote maximum domestic and world economic growth, and help assure domestic price stability.

COMMITTEE REVIEW OF THE PRESIDENT'S PRIVATE SECTOR SURVEY ON COST CONTROL

SEC. 9. It is the sense of the House of Representatives that—

(1) each of its standing committees should review and study, on a continuing basis, those portions of the the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control affecting subjects within its jurisdiction;

(2) each of its standing committees should, in its consideration of any bill or joint resolution of a public character within its jurisdictions, review those portions of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control pertaining to such bill or resolution; and

(3) each report of any such committee on a bill or joint resolution of a public character should contain—

(A) an identification of each recommendation of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control implemented in such bill or resolution and the estimated dollar amount of program cost savings or revenue enhancement as a result of the implementation of each such recommendation; and

(B) a statement setting forth each recommendation of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control pertaining to such bill or resolution, the disposition of each such recommendation, and the reasons for such disposition.

LIMITATION ON BENEFITS TO ALIENS

SEC. 10. It is the sense of the Congress that functional totals should be reduced to reflect a limitation on the amount of social security benefits paid to illegal and nonresident aliens. It is assumed that the Finance Committee and the Ways and Means Committee will report legislation to accomplish the required changes in law. Such legislation may limit benefits to the amount of wage-earner's contribution plus interest, unless the wage-earner is a citizen of a country with which the United States has a treaty or totalization agreement and that this provision would apply to individuals becoming eligible on or after January 1, 1986.

Resolved, That the House recede from its amendment to the title of the aforesaid resolution.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, we now have all the time anyone wants. The matter before us is the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I yield whatever time the distinguished Senator desires.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I should like to read a resolution which was adopted by the Republican conference of the U.S. Senate today. This resolution was adopted unanimously, and we are grateful to Senators ARMSTRONG and DANFORTH for drafting what was the reflection of the views of all those present:

Whereas, the the Republican Conference of the Senate of the United States expresses its appreciation for the outstanding leadership and tireless efforts of the Majority Leader, Senator Dole, and the Chairman of the Budget Committee, Senator Domenici, in achieving the pending conference report on the budget resolution; and

Whereas, the Conference finds that this budget resolution achieves significant spending reduction, but reduces the budget far less than needed; and

Whereas, the Conference finds that, despite passage of this budget resolution, enormous deficits are in prospect which threaten the economic future of this nation and the financial well-being of every family in America; and

Whereas, the Conference finds that the magnitude of current debt and the compounding effect of interest on the national debt urgently require additional deficit reduction; and

Whereas, the Conference finds that this budget resolution provides only a ceiling on permissible spending and that nothing in this resolution is intended to prevent Congress from spending less than the amounts reflected therein or from acting on the numerous and bipartisan proposals for further substantial deficit reduction,

Therefore, be it resolved That the Congress should adopt further deficit reduction measures at the earliest available opportunity, in order to reduce deficits to no more than 2 percent of the GNP in 1988 and balance the budget by 1990.

That is the Republican conference resolution.

Mr. CHILES. I would like to urge that it be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield to the Senator from Washington such time as he desires.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, it has been my distinct honor to serve on the conference committee on this budget resolution with eight very hard-working and dedicated colleagues who have signed the recommendation that the conference committee report be adopted. I do so with some considerable disappointment, but at the same time with the firm feeling that we should adopt this conference committee report and then enforce this budget resolution.

From the beginning of this process in January, I suspect that all of us sought a budget resolution which was both effective and fair. By effective, we mean a budget resolution which would succeed in substantially reducing budget deficits and give us at least a promise that that budget, at some time in the future, would be balanced. By fair, we mean one which defines the burden of coming to that conclusion equitably among the people of the United States.

From the point of view of this debate, of course, we have had at least four distinct major proposals before us: That proposed by the Senate Budget Committee; that passed by the Senate dramatically, early in May, by the vote of the courageous Senator from California; the so-called Gorton-Chiles proposal in the Budget Committee itself; and the most recent bipartisan proposal by members of this committee of both parties. But none of those four proposals is before us tonight.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, the Senate is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is not in order. Those Senators wishing to converse are urged to remove themselves from the Chamber.

Mr. GORTON. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, it is my view that each of those four proposals was more effective and more fair, under that definition, than is the proposal before us at the present time—most particularly the last two, because they were clearly the most effective and the only two which gave the slightest indication that we would ever reduce our deficits below $100 billion a year, much less to a balance, and were preferable even to the first of those two.

1Mr. President, I must say in this regard, as in many others, we find that the perfect can easily be the mortal enemy of the good. Maybe each of those is an exaggeration with respect to the proposals before us, and it should be more appropriate to say that the good is the mortal enemy of the fair, a distinct step forward.

Given the fact that the President of the United States and the leadership of the House of Representatives—probably fairly stated, the leadership of the House of Representatives in both parties—were adamantly opposed to all four of those proposals, and most particularly to the last two, and due to the fact that we do have a divided Government in this Congress and in this administration, that effective alliance between the President and the Speaker of the House of Representatives makes it impossible to come to a perfect or even to a very good solution. But we do not have that choice here tonight. We have a choice between this budget resolution and Government by chaos and Government by no budget resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is not in order. Staff members at the rear of the Chamber are requested to leave the Chamber. Those staff members conversing on the Republican side are to absent themselves from the Chamber.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, as I was attempting to communicate, at this point, given a divided Government, we have the option between this budget resolution and Government by chaos.

An attempt to bring points of order against appropriations bills or to utilize the debt ceiling resolution in another month or two in an attempt to see whether or not we can reach a better conclusion, that is highly unlikely at best and disastrous at worst.

This is the best solution achievable under the circumstances. It is due to the efforts of many Members in this body, but three in particular: the majority leader, who has courageously represented the point of view of the majority of the Senate of the United States, a majority, I suspect, on both sides of the debates, both public and with the administration; the most distinguished and thoughtful and considerate ranking minority member of the Budget Committee, the Senator from Florida, who has often lost in proposals which he has made but who has seen many of the ideas which he has expounded at least reach the point at which a majority of this body support them very, very wholeheartedly; but most particularly, Mr. President, the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee, the Senator from New Mexico, who is literally worth his weight in diamonds to this body and to the people of the United States. His courage and constant persistence have brought us a proposal which he admits is far from what we would have wished but is infinitely better than anything we would have had without those efforts. And every person here and every person in the United States owes to the Senator from New Mexico an immense debt of gratitude.

This is half a loaf. Very few people will claim that it is more than that, but it is an important half loaf. It is important in that at least we will no longer see budget deficits which are increasing. Instead of deficits going from $220 billion, perhaps to $300 billion, we will see them in the order of $190 billion, $180 billion, maybe $170 billion.

I wished for much more, but the people of the United States will gain by receiving this half loaf and permitting us in the near future I hope to begin once again. This is not the end of the war. It is one scrimmage or one battle. The next battle if this resolution is passed at least will be fought on more favorable ground.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, may I have 2 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield the Senator however much time he needs.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

I thank the distinguished majority leader for attempting to get an answer to my question or maybe he got the answer. May I ask him what he found out in his conversation with the White House?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, if the distinguished minority leader will yield, I did make a telephone call and I did find out the President would like us to pass this budget resolution.

Mr. BYRD. Who said so?

Mr. DOLE. The chief of staff.

Mr. BYRD. Who is the chief of staff?

Mr. DOLE. It was Donald Regan, but he was at a meeting I had with the President this afternoon and we discussed it and I want to make sure I have it right. But I think the President will indicate he would like more, but that this is a step in the right direction and that he would like us to pass it.

Mr. BYRD. I appreciate what the distinguished majority leader has said. Could he tell us what Mr. Regan, the chief of staff for the Commander in Chief, said about the resolution and whether or not the President supports it?

Mr. DOLE. I think my inference is the President wants us to pass it and that would indicate his support. I spent about an hour with the President this afternoon, and I think there was not any doubt in my mind that he wanted us to pass this proposal, that he supports it, not with great enthusiasm. I do not think a lot of people do here. But I do not know what else I could tell the distinguished minority leader. He is pleased it has no taxes in it. But I think he feels that we have actually done a pretty good job.

Mr. BYRD. Did Mr. Regan indicate that the President would not be critical of this resolution if it is passed?

Mr. DOLE. The President will issue a statement shortly, hopefully, if we pass the resolution, and I have heard that statement and it is not critical.

Mr. BYRD. And it is not critical.

I certainly appreciate the distinguished majority leader's statement. My vote on this will be determined by whether or not Mr. Regan, the chief of staff, clearly indicated that the President of the United States supports this resolution. It may not be everything he wants. It is not everything I want or everything the majority leader wants. But I am not sure that I yet have a clear understanding as to what Mr. Regan said in response to the question asked by the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. I just say to the distinguished minority leader I was there. I was not really quoting Mr. Regan. You do not visit the President and run out and quote a President. But I think as I recall the visit and paraphrasing what was said, we discussed the history of the budget debate and a number of other things and focused on what would happen this evening, and I had the clear impression that the President supports this conference report again with reservations. I think everyone here has reservations. I am not going to vote for it with any enthusiasm. I am going to vote for it because I think it is an improvement over the House-passed budget resolution. So, I think that is fairly firm. It is not from the chief of staff. This is from the President himself.

And beyond that, I just cannot say unless I can call the President back and I hate to do that. I just say the President supports this conference report.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I will not press the majority leader any further. I thank him. I take it by what the majority leader has said that the President does support this budget resolution conference report, and I ask the majority leader one more time, because I want to be sure as I can be, to state what Mr. Regan said in response to the majority leader's questions on the phone just a few minutes ago.

Mr. DOLE. I asked Mr. Regan, in fact I told Mr. Regan that I had been asked by the distinguished minority leader if I could indicate publicly that the President supported the conference report. I reviewed the conversation we had earlier and reviewed the release that I had seen at that time, and I indicated to Mr. Regan that I felt from that conversation, visit, and the statement which will be released that the President would want us to pass this conference report. He said that is true; the President wants it passed. He has reservations, and he did not say "supports," but I think everything else was there.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield me 1 minute?

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am not going to vote for the conference report. My reasons are very simple. I do not think the people of this country, the business element or for that matter any thoughtful student of this subject would recommend to us a deficit of the dimension that is called for in this measure. When the conferees, of the Senate and the House have reduced spending every way they responsibly could do it, and I assume they have done that, they should have been calling upon us to raise revenue to help further reduce the deficit.

Mr. Paul Volcker, Chairman of the Federal Reserve, has said on occasion that we should cut spending all we can and then reduce that deficit by adding some revenue.

I know the majority leader has suggested that. The minority leader has recommended that. Mr. CHILES has recommended that. I read by the reports that Mr. DOMENICI has recommended that.

The President does not agree.

But for us to stop at this point, by having reduced spending to the extent that the conferees have done and I assume the best of their ability to cut spending, it is my judgment that we should have been called upon to increase revenues to further reduce the deficit.

The Senator from Louisiana is the ranking Democrat on the Finance Committee, and in my judgment we should have been called on to recommend to this Senate a revenue measure to help further reduce this deficit and to not reduce the deficit any more than this resolution achieved in my judgment is not responsible.

While I appreciate the dedicated efforts of those who tried to reduce it and undoubtedly have tried to do it——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator suspend?

The Senate is not in order. The distinguished Senator from Louisiana has a right to be heard. The Senate is not in order. We will not continue until the Senate is in order.

The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Notwithstanding the long hours and diligent efforts made by those who represented the Senate in conference, the majority leader and minority leader, I do not think that the huge deficit is in the national interest, Mr. President, and I simply cannot vote for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. CHILES. I yield time to the distinguished Senator from Montana.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank the ranking member of the Budget Committee for yielding me time.

I wonder if the majority leader would be kind enough to yield for a question.

We have looked over the agriculture figures, and the reconciliation for agriculture covering those programs for commodities and loan programs, credit programs, research, it is $7.9 billion. In other words, it is an $8 billion reconciliation.

Mr. DOLE. Which is the House number.

Mr. MELCHER. I would ask the distinguished majority leader, since we have been discussing the farm bill costs in debate in committee and here on the floor. I ask, is it not irrelevant what the deficiency payments are, the target prices are for crop years 1988 and 1989 as far as this budget resolution is concerned?

Mr. DOLE. What was the first part of the question?

Mr. MELCHER. Is it not irrelevant, as far as this budget resolution is concerned, what the deficiency payments are for crop years 1988 and 1989?

Mr. DOLE. No; I do not think it is irrelevant. It seems to me there have to be some assumptions made to reach these figures, the $7.9 billion figure, which was the House number.

Mr. MELCHER. I want to be sure we have the same understanding. The $7.9 billion reconciliation will come out of the fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988 expenditures.

Mr. DOLE. Right.

Mr. MELCHER. That being the case, since the deficiency payments for crop year 1988 will be paid in fiscal 1989, it does not apply in this budget, nor does the reconciliation figure of $7.9 billion?

Mr. DOLE. The Senator is talking about the outyears? We do not deal with that year; the Senator is correct.

Mr. MELCHER. I want to just make this point. Yesterday in committee we voted for a 2-year freeze on target prices that would cover the crop years 1986 and 1987. Since those deficiency payments called for target price freezes in which crop year 1987 would be paid in fiscal 1988, the full budget impact has been considered in that particular proposal. And that was the Senator's proposal, was it not?

Mr. DOLE. That is correct.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank the distinguished majority leader, because I think he is on the right track with his proposal in committee yesterday. So what was done by that particular amendment covered all of the deficiency payments that will be contemplated in this budget. But in the following 2 years, the so-called outyears, those deficiency payments will be made in fiscal 1989 and fiscal 1990, not covered by this budget. So, the proposal I have made for the last 2 years is not affected by this budget.

Mr. DOLE. That is correct.

Mr. MELCHER. So if we hold target prices steady in those 2 outyears, we are assuming, regretfully, and possibly mistakenly, that the current level of target prices will be enough.

But, nevertheless, the point I want to make is that we have been arguing for the past couple of days about a part of the farm bill on the target prices for crop years beyond this budget resolution. What we accepted in the committee on the motion of the distinguished majority leader, the Senator from Kansas, who understands the farm program and particularly the wheat program as well or better than anybody else on this floor, was to accept his motion to freeze target prices for at least the first 2 years; and by doing so, the full budget impact for target prices was addressed. Those of us who feel strongly that we cannot cut target prices in the next 2 fiscal years beyond that to anything less than that covered in this 3-year span, I think, have probably made our case on behalf of agriculture producers and that is the least we can do in the farm bill.

I hope that we will not be accused of following the wrong leadership and busting the budget when we take up the matter again, in September, because we have followed the majority leader in his proposal for the first 2 years of the bill and we believe we can do no less for the last 2 years of the bill.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS].

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I am one of those who believes in the Senate as an institution. I think it is my personal duty to uphold it and back it, the institution, whenever I can. I have been here during the start of two wars and have had other hard questions arise, but this is the most critical test, I believe, that the Senate has had since I have been here. And it has made a start on finding a way through to a solution, a major part thereof, to this problem.

After all, this is our responsibility. This is purely a matter of raising revenue and appropriating revenue. It is clear as a bell throughout the Constitution that the sole power to raise revenue rests with the Congress and also to make appropriations. So, I wish it meant more.

First, a word about the men. I wish I was in the group that contributed to this. I have not been. But I have never seen a finer effort. Some men have been here a short term for Senate tenure and others are new faces. There were many that made tremendous contributions in this field and still have not attained anything like a solution, but they will keep trying. So I am going to support it, not because I like what it is, but it is a start. And I think we made that start, and we can finish it the same way.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. President, let me say to Senators, regardless of what kind of economic forecasting you want to use and what you think about the future and what you think we might have done, let me tell you that of the budget that the President of the United States sent us, without putting any new taxes on—because the President says we should not now and I really urge to you that we cannot put it on here and count it if he says we are not going to get any. So let me go back. He sends us a budget. We have one little process, budget process. We reduce that expenditure level that he gives us by $277 billion—I have said it correctly—off of what he asks us to do, and there is still a deficit.

We are told by everyone that we cannot touch COLA's. And believe me, we have tried. They will not go in this thing. The President says, "No, and the House says, "No."

It seems to me there is only one issue, if that is all you have on the table: Have we done the best we could with what is there? And I will tell you, I have been at it awhile, and we are only one House. We are the Senate. The other body is another body, and the President is the other one. I think we have done the best we can with the agenda on the table that is before us.

We can talk about what we could have done, what we might have done, what we would have done if we had a bigger table. But there is not any. I was even told a few days ago what is gone is gone. You have done the best you could. Get on with the future. We did. I do not see how anybody can stand around here and say it is the greatest, but neither do I think you ought to run around saying $277 billion off a President's budget that is only 4 months old is a little insignificant kind of job. Sure, the Senator from Louisiana is right. We did not cut the budget enough. Sure, he could put some taxes on. Surely, if the President says we should not, we would have a real phony resolution if you want to put it in there. Put it in. He says it will never become law. So, it is not in there. So, I am not gung ho. I do not think it is a marvelous thing because we could have done better. But I have been sitting here all afternoon, we are finally getting down here, making a few speeches, and we are talking like it is nothing. It is only the biggest budget cut in the history of the Republic.

What are you going to do this afternoon? That may be nothing, but it is a first. You have been meeting for a couple hundred years. We never did anything like this in real dollars, proportionate dollars, or relevant to anything else. We never did anything like this. So, it seems to me that at least we ought to get on with voting it out of here, and let all of the other committees do their work.

Before I sit down, I want to thank the majority leader. He has been marvelous. When we started off, he was not even involved in this budget process. I would let him take the chair right now. He knows enough about it to run it.

I thank all of the rest of us, particularly LAWTON CHILES, and I apologize to some of you. Some chairmen were worried about us taking too much time. We are sorry we did. To those who have not been able to get their work done around here because we have been doing this, and we are sorry. We will get out of the way now. We hope you can all get your work done, and that we have not interfered too much. We just happened to think we could not give up. We could have given up 2 or 3 weeks ago. I felt very much like doing it, I tell you. If it had not been for your encouragement, the leaders' encouragement, some willingness to change along the way, to offer something new, I would have chucked it to you about 4 weeks ago, and to everybody else—to the U.S. House, and the President down there. And for those who say, "Well, good, some of you make that speech here because you say we should not do it"—those who are saying that is good, that is just what you should have done—I ask you what you would have gotten by the end of the year, and what you would have next year, and the year after. You get up here and tell me you would have gotten dynamite. You would have gotten nothing, vetos, continuing resolution, fights, debt limit that we never extend, and we may not, and we would have gotten no master plan or genius to put on that thing either. So, I think we ought to vote it in.

Unless somebody on my side wants some more time, I want to yield back the rest.

Mr. THURMOND and Mr. McCLURE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Idaho, and 3 minutes to the distinguished Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I am very reluctant and very hesitant to take the floor this evening to make any remarks, particularly after that very eloquent and moving speech by the distinguished Senator from New Mexico has made, because I rise in opposition to the resolution. I do it for a very simple reason.

Everybody knows that we are not going to control the Federal spending until we are willing to confront the growth of the entitlement programs. This resolution does not do that. No matter how you slice it, until you are ready to do that, we are not going to stop the growth of the Federal spending.

It is less than 5 years that a new President took over in this country. The Republicans became the majority party in this body for the first time in a quarter of a century. And we had in our first year the unenviable task of voting to increase the debt limit to $1 trillion. Remember that day? Remember when some of my friends on the other side of the aisle were giving the Republicans the dickens for voting for the largest debt ceiling in the history of the country?

The distinguished minority leader suggests we have got to have a pledge from the President of the United States; he will not criticize our results. I do not see anybody over there making a pledge. You are not going to criticize Republicans for presiding over the big deficits. As a matter of fact, I suspect that is exactly what is going to happen. Perhaps they should, because in spite of this budget resolution now 5 years after we faced $1 trillion, we are facing next year a $2 trillion debt ceiling.

Ladies and gentlemen, with the budget resolution that we have here that has no restraint on the growth of entitlements, in 5 years, we will be facing a $3 trillion budget deficit—national debt. How are you going to vote on that? Are you going to withhold your criticism for the Republicans and the President of the United States for having allowed that to happen? No. Some of the people that demand assurances that the President would not criticize us will be turning around and criticizing the President loudly for having allowed that kind of a budget deficit. I, for one, recognize the difficulties that the distinguished members of the Budget Committee have had in trying to come to a resolution of this matter. I do not envy them their task. I commend them for their dogged determination to produce anything. I think they have done the very best that they can. But for the Senator from Idaho, it is not good enough. It is not good enough when we recognize the kind of fiscal and economic chaos that is in store for this country with $200 billion deficits built on top of $200 billion deficits, and we vote for a resolution that permits that, and say it has our approval. It does not have mine.

Mr. CHILES. I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Louisiana.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I went to bed last night determined to vote against this resolution; disappointed because it did not cut enough, a little bit mad because of certain stubborn people in high places who kept us from doing that which was in the national interest and thinking that half a loaf is not enough, that we ought to hold out for a whole loaf. But, Mr. President, I thought how are we going to get from here to there. And as I began to dream off into sleep, not quite asleep, I thought am I going to lead that fight? Then I thought, well, maybe not, because I have not quite figured how to get from here to there. Just what is it we are going to do? And I figured, well, not me. Let us put somebody else in the leadership. Then I thought, who else has a plan? I finally figured out nobody has a plan, because there is no plan that is better than this. You can criticize it. I have soundly criticized it. It is only half a loaf. Maybe it is only a quarter of a loaf. But let me tell you, you are not going to get taxes because of the President, and you are not certainly going to get taxes without entitlement, and you are not going to get entitlements in this Congress. We all know that. The two go together. I think, with the distinguished Senator from Ohio, we ought to have both. But we cannot get both. There is just no way to get from here to there.

Mr. President, I do not see any strategy in chaos. We could break this thing down and go to an emergency status, have vetoes, have criminations, recriminations, and all the rest. But I do not see the strategy. I just do not see how it could work. And I am willing to follow. I would be willing to follow the President if he said, "Let us defy the rest of Congress and get a real budget," or I would follow my distinguished colleague from New Mexico, or my distinguished colleague from Florida. But we do not have a strategy, not any of us do. This is all we have.

There used to be a saying that all 535 Members of Congress want to balance the budget. They just have different ways of doing it. That is almost true today. I guess there are one or two so-called "supply siders" who think there is some positive good in having deficits, and maybe they do not have a strategy. The rest of us do. We just differ as to how to do it. But if anybody can give me a strategy as to how you can put together enough Members to do better than this, I have not heard it. I have been listening very, very carefully.

Mr. President, the fact is we have no one to follow. We have no one to follow. We have no plan other than this plan.

It does something. It is $68 billion in spending reconciliation. It is over $8 billion in taxes. They will call it something else, I guess. Reconciliation. And it is over $200 billion in cuts of the deficits, some of it smoke and mirrors, some of it real, but a heck of a lot more than we get without a plan.

This is the only game in town. It is the only plan. With a lot of sadness and in the cold light of day, I say it is our only choice.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the distinguished Senator from Louisiana for his observations. I yield back the balance of my time except for 6 minutes, 3 of which I yield to the Senator from South Carolina and 3 to the majority leader.

How much time does the Senator from Alaska desire?

Mr. STEVENS. Three minutes.

Mr. DOMENICI. And 3 minutes to the Senator from Alaska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I do not know of a more important matter to the people of America today than cutting these taxes. It simply means we will have more inflation and higher interest rates if we do not take the necessary steps. We have balanced the budget once in 8 years, three times in 25 years. It is time we got busy and balance the budget.

On the other hand, the President takes a strong position. He has a right to the veto. The House has not taken the steps they should have taken, but I think the Senate took the right steps here. It took a lot of courage on the part of the Senate to do it. But we cannot do it alone.

I am convinced that it is better to save $277 billion and get this much done, if we do not get any more.

This is not the budget I want. I wanted to see a real budget, to balance it.

Senator DOMENICI has worked night and day. I have never seen a man work harder. In the years I have been here I have not seen a Senator who knows more about the budget and who has slaved to get something done than he.

The majority leader has had meetings in his office time after time. I stopped everything and went. Others did the same thing. That was to try to balance this budget. I think we better take this $277 billion or we will not get anything. This is the first step. Then if we have the courage we will take other steps to go further and try to bring this budget into balance.

I hope this budget, as advocated by the distinguished chairman, will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I will not take the full time. I wanted to reaffirm the statements which have been made here about the others concerning the work of the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, but beyond that I would like the Senate to look ahead a little bit and realize that this is just the first of a series of years when we will be called upon to make really tough budget decisions.

We do not know where the majority is going to be in those years, I will tell you frankly, in terms of the relationship of the parties here in the Senate.

This chairman and the ranking member have done excellent work. I echo what my friend from Mississippi has said in that regard.

It could well be that in a short period of time the roles may be reversed. I remember when they were. But I think it is imperative that we establish a bipartisan support for the budget process. We need the support for the work of the majority on this side of the aisle, but the Members of the Senate on the other side of the aisle need fully to recognize that they, too, may need support sometime in the future just as some in this body needed it in the past.

I see my good friend looking at me now. He got support in the past.

The support is for the process inherent in the law that we passed. As I said, it is imperative that we give it that support. Unless we do, we are going to face worse chaos under some of the suggestions I have heard here as to how to bring about a reduction.

This is the only mechanism we have to bring about a reduction, not only this year but in the years to come.

So I would urge a strong bipartisan support for what I consider to be a very, very good effort, which has taken us, I will remind Members, 7 months.

It may be that the whole budget system itself and the basic law should be reviewed under the oversight process soon to see if we can devise a way so that it will not take that long, to put mandatory times in on getting the report back so there is an alternative to reach this vote earlier in the year. Under the system they are working under now, the Budget Committee has done a good job and they deserve our support.

THE BUDGET RESOLUTION CONFERENCE REPORT: FAR TOO LITTLE, FAR TOO LATE

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, as we approach the rollcall vote, I must say that I am disappointed that the conference on the budget resolution failed to produce a responsible deficit reduction.

The American people had been led to believe that the major objective of the Congress in 1985 was to reduce the Federal deficit.

There had been much discussion last year about how this objective could be accomplished. Former Vice President Walter Mondale adopted the view that so-called deficit reduction could be achieved only by raising taxes and simultaneously increasing certain domestic spending. The voters spoke rather resoundingly last November on their view of this, and many other, of Mr. Mondale's views.

Mr. President, some Members of Congress have not yet received the message from the voters last November. They have persisted all year long in trying to devise means—directly and indirectly—for increasing taxes on the American people.

Thanks to the resolute opposition of President Reagan, the big taxers have been unsuccessful—at least thus far—in getting either the House or Senate to adopt tax increases as a part of so-called deficit reduction.

On the other side of Mr. Mondale's mistaken policy was a proposal for increases in domestic spending. Unfortunately, Mr. President, liberal big spenders have been more successful in this final budget document in implementing parts of this ill-conceived concept.

In the midst of a document that purports to be achieving major deficit reductions are numerous items to increase Federal spending.

Obviously, this document has just become available, but I have already discovered several increases in programs within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry, which I chair.

The conference report totally rejects the reasonable reductions included in the Senate-passed budget resolution for federally funded food assistance programs. Reductions of $500 million were proposed for the Food Stamp Program over a period of 3 years. Reductions of $1.2 billion were proposed for the various child nutrition programs over 3 years.

Rather than reduce spending by $1.7 billion over 3 years, however, the conference report increases spending for these programs by almost that amount.

The conference report proposes to increase food stamp spending by over $1 billion over 3 years—$1 billion over and above the increases already assumed for inflation. The Food Stamp Program, which now costs $12.5 billion, would escalate to over $14 billion annually by fiscal year 1988, under the assumptions included in the budget resolution conference report.

Part of that increase is a result of over $200 million increase for the Nutrition Assistance Program in Puerto Rico. That program was established at $825 million annually to reduce what had been the rapid growth in the Puerto Rican program. Without that reform, the program in Puerto Rico alone would be costing over $1 billion annually. Almost 60 percent of the Puerto Rican population was on the Food Stamp Program prior to the establishment of the $825 million grant. Under the conference report suggestion, Puerto Rico's program would once again begin escalating.

The President proposed in his budget to reduce spending in child nutrition programs. But what the President noted was that a large portion of spending for child nutrition programs—over $1 billion annually—goes for children receiving federally subsidized meals who are from families with incomes far above the poverty line. He recommended that reductions be made in the subsidies for these nonpoor families. The Senate-passed resolution included some of these reductions.

Instead, the conference report proposes to continue, unabated, this spendng for nonpoor children and to increase spending for child nutrition programs by over $100 million annually—again that much in increases over the increases already assumed for inflation. Spending for these programs will escalate from $5.5 billion to $6.4 billion by fiscal year 1988 under the assumptions contained in this conference report.

Frankly, Mr. President, I find too little in this conference report that is acceptable as true deficit reductions. It appears to this Senator that the conference report has become little more than a vehicle for restraining defense spending. No restraint of welfare spending or of other major domestic spending programs.

I have previously indicated to the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee, Senator DOMENICI, that I would be unable to support such a final product. I ask that a copy of a letter to Senator DOMENICI be printed at this point in the RECORD:

The letter follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, June 24, 1985.

Hon. PETER V. DOMENICI,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR PETE: Realizing that you are deeply involved in the conference on the budget resolution, I do not desire to complicate your already difficult task. However, I feel obliged to convey to you my concerns about various reports I'm hearing concerning the final shape of the conference report.

I am absolutely convinced that it is essential that the final package contain the features of the Senate-passed resolution which attempts to reform significantly some of the spending for domestic programs.

I am concerned that the final document not become merely an outline for restricting defense spending, without significantly addressing restraint or reductions in domestic spending. Frankly, if the final document becomes merely a guise for reducing defense expenditures—with little or no other reductions—it will have lost its central purpose, and I cannot support such a result.

The Senate-passed reductions are reasonable. I certainly hope that you and the other conferees will insist on these important provisions.

Kindest personal regards.

Sincerely,

JESSE HELMS,
Chairman.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, for the reasons outlined in that letter and those already cited, I am forced to oppose the conference report. I hope that it will be rejected and then perhaps the conferees can get down to business of serious budget reduction—by reducing these large spending programs.

I should specify, Mr. President, that the conference report establishes increases for food stamps and child nutrition at the subtotal level without making corresponding increases in the overall total for income security—function 600. This will mean, if the resolution is properly enforced, that any attempts to increase spending in either food stamps or child nutrition will result in the necessity to reduce spending in other programs under the jurisdiction, for appropriations, of the Agriculture Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee.

So while the increase may not materialize, it seems to me that the conference report contains "funny numbers" that create an appearance of doing something to reduce the deficit while at the same time giving encouragement to ever greater Federal domestic spending.

Mr. President, another serious shortcoming in the conference report is the slippage in savings attributed to agricultural programs within the jurisdiction of the Agriculture Committee.

The savings in the conference report for this function have been significantly reduced, by $2.4 billion. Again, Mr. President, the conference report moves in the wrong direction—toward less savings, rather than maximum savings.

Agriculture program spending can and must be reduced, for the good of both farmers and taxpayers.

Mr. President, I am also troubled by the inclusion of tax increases in the budget resolution—and especially troubled by specific tax that some of the budget conferees, and others, apparently have in mind.

The tax increases appear designed to be just large enough to allow, among other increases, a continuation in the 16 cents per pack tax on cigarettes.

That tax is currently scheduled to fall to 8 cents on October 1.

Mr. President, I must oppose any efforts seeking to make permanent the current 16 cents Federal excise tax on each pack of cigarettes. It was my amendment to the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 that calls for the tax to be lowered back to its original 8 cents per pack beginning October 1, 1985.

I am sure the budget conferees have good intentions, but there are two primary reasons why I will be forced to respectfully disagree with them on this particular matter.

First, this action proposes a tax increase. Although it may be tempting to suggest that this would freeze the existing 16 cents per pack cigarette excise tax, it is critical to remember that one-half of the 16 cents is a temporary surtax enacted in 1982 and scheduled to end, or "sunset," this year. The Senate Budget Committee, in its effort to maintain existing revenue law, quite properly assumed in the Senate passed resolution that the sunset would take place this year as promised by Congress in 1982.

Second, consumers of tobacco products already bear an inordinate share of taxes imposed by all levels of government. Smokers paid Federal, State, and local governments a record $9.3 billion in tobacco taxes for the year ending June 30, 1984. The amount, levied on 28.5 billion packs, was an increase of $1.5 billion over the previous year and was more than three times the amount received by tobacco farmers for their 1984 crop.

The Federal cigarette excise tax raised $4.7 billion in this 12-month period. The amount was a $1.3 billion increase over the previous year's collections. Tobacco has been taxed by the Federal Government since 1863. The first State cigarette tax was imposed by Iowa in 1921. Over the past 121 years, tobacco taxes have generated more than $164 billion in revenue. I do not know of any other commodity that is as overtaxed as tobacco.

It is also my strong feeling that the regressive nature of cigarette excise taxes causes them to affect most adversely those who can least afford them—the working people of this country. Excessive cigarette taxes are an undue hardship to the 55 million Americans who choose to smoke, as well as the 276,000 family farmers who depend on tobacco for their livelihoods and the 50,000 workers who earn their living in tobacco manufacturing.

In conclusion, Mr. President, this budget resolution proposes a tax increase, and tobacco is already overtaxed.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, on May 9, I began my statement on the White House-Republican leadership budget plan by saying:

It has been a tortuous 3 weeks since the first copy of the so-called White House-Republican leadership budget plan arrived on our desks, heralded as the bottom line in deficit reduction for 1986 through 1988.

Well, the last 3 months have been even more tortuous, as the House and Senate conferees have struggled to reach a budget compromise that makes meaningful headway in reducing the huge Federal budget deficit. The product of their labor is now before the Senate and I intend to support it. However, let me quickly add that much like the victory of Pyrrhus over the Romans at Apulum in 279 B.C., the "victory" of reaching a deficit reduction compromise tonight may be a hollow one. Let me attempt to explain.

First, Mr. President, the deficit reduction assumed in the conference agreement will total only $39 billion in fiscal year 1986, according to the Congressional Budget Office bookkeepers. Using CBO's numbers, the deficit would be $181 billion next year and would shrink to $161 billion by fiscal year 1988. Even the more optimistic Office of Management and Budget accounting system shows that the deficit would still be $112 billion by 1988. That is a far cry from the surplus that the President predicted we would have in 1985 and 1986, when he outlined his economic blueprint back in February 1981. Furthermore, these deficit reduction assumptions are largely predicated on passage of an omnibus reconciliation bill that changes existing law to achieve savings and revenue increases over the next 3 years. These legislative changes would tackle some of the most politically sensitive and popular programs and activities in the Federal Government and will be extremely difficult to do as the Senate and the House approach another election year. For example, legislation to impose user fees on businesses to cover the cost of Customs services at the border and airports; legislation to achieve cuts in farm programs; and legislation to achieve savings in veterans programs will not be easy to achieve. Failure to address these and other reconciliation guidelines by the end of this session of Congress can only mean even larger deficits next year and in the outyears. Therefore, when all of the dust settles, we may not have even the limited deficit reduction target contained in the conference agreement.

Second, as I understand it, the budget conferees have opted not to impose tough, binding enforcement mechanisms in the compromise agreement. For example, there is no appropriation "cap" in the conference agreement that would help discipline the House and Senate Appropriations Committees in reporting and passing annual spending bills. Frankly, I would support a comprehensive appropriation cap that covers both defense and nondefense discretionary spending. The Senate-passed budget resolution contained two separate caps—one for defense and one for everyone else. I opposed that approach because it virtually held harmless defense spending from being stacked up against nondefense spending priorities in competition for scarce taxpayers dollars. Therefore, aside from reconciliation, there is no real "traffic cop" provision in the conference agreement that would put a lid on overall defense and nondefense discretionary spending.

Finally, Mr. President, I believe that the final conference agreement on the budget is a hollow victory because it lacks the full support of the President of the United States. It is true with spending reform and tax reform: without the full weight and power of the President of the United States, true, meaningful reform and deficit reduction will not be achieved. I am deeply disappointed that the President apparently pulled out of the conference battle a few weeks back, leaving his own Republican budget conferees dangling by themselves to fight it out with the House on a deficit reduction compromise. I am convinced that if the President had waded in with his own party negotiators; rolled up his sleeves; and used the tremendous power of persuasion that he clearly possesses, we would have a deficit reduction package before us that would make real progress in reaching a balanced budget before 1990. Furthermore, the jury is still out as to whether the President will use his considerable political clout to help push the reconciliation bill that will implement many of the savings and revenue initiatives contained in this conference report. I hope that he will, but it is one more major intangible that will ultimately help dictate whether we really achieve savings and cut the deficit next year and over the next 3 years.

Mr. President, I trust that my doubts about whether or not this conference report will actually cut the deficit, will not cloud my support for the conference report.

The conference report at least establishes the groundwork for cutting the deficit by $39 to $55 billion, depending on whose economic assumptions you embrace. It does set in motion the machinery to cut the deficit by $200 billion over 3 years. It does take some meaningful steps toward rolling back low priority spending in such activities as administrative overhead in Government programs and foreign aid. It freezes certain nondefense discretionary spending programs at current levels, thus reigning-in the growth of these programs in fiscal year 1986 and beyond. And it forces cuts in spending for the legislative branch.

At the same time, the conference agreement allows full COLA's for Social Security recipients; protects critical law enforcement activities including our new initiatives against terrorism; and maintains full inflation adjustments for our most needy veterans who have served our country with dignity and courage. And, finally, the conference agreement provides enough room for a strong national defense program for fiscal year 1986 through 1988, without compromising our efforts to ferret out waste, fraud, and abuse in the Defense Department.

Mr. President, our colleagues in the Senate who have toiled so long and hard on this budget compromise deserve great credit for bringing us a package that takes a small but important step toward reducing the deficit next year and in the years to come. Senator DOMENICI and Senator CHILES, the chairman and ranking member of the Budget Committee respectively, should be applauded for pulling out this "overtime" victory on the budget, especially when they apparently did so with their star quarterback—the President of the United States—on the sideline. The compromise is a good balance of restraint and progress in our effort to reduce the deficit yet maintain essential Government services and programs. The conference report deserves our support.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I support this budget resolution and am pleased to see that it does not include a freeze on the Social Security cost-of-living adjustment which was the roadblock to my supporting the Senate budget resolution. I am also pleased that our veterans, who have served this country so selflessly, will also be treated fairly.

This budget process has been a long and arduous process, Mr. President, and one that has caught the attention of the Nation. Most Americans believe that our deficit is the No. 1 problem facing this country and they have no patience with a Congress that is unable to restrain spending and unable to make politically difficult decisions. While I am grateful to my Senate colleagues on the Budget Committee for their hours of work on this legislation, I must admit that this is merely a downpayment and that we still have substantial work to do before our financial house is in order. This resolution is a beginning, but we cannot stop here. If we do not continue to come to terms with Federal spending, it will wreak havoc in our economy and the resulting high interest rates will threaten every American in all walks of life.

Mr. President, the near collapse of the budget conference this year is clear evidence to me that Social Security should not be part of the unified budget. In March of this year, when I realized that Social Security would again become the political football in this debate, I introduced legislation to remove it from the unified budget. If adopted, my legislation would effect next year's budget process so that we could no longer hold Social Security recipients hostage during the debate on this Nation's debt, and it would no longer be a reason for delaying final action on a budget resolution.

I have stated many times on this floor, that Social Security is not part of the deficit problem. It does not compete for scarce general revenue funds and should not be placed on the reduction table enabling Congress to escape making even tougher spending reductions. I look forward to working on this issue when we return in the fall to ensure that this important legislation is adopted before this process begins next year.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, with the Nation facing a fiscal future of $200 billion annual deficits "as far as the eye can see," the Senate today solved the problem simply by closing its eyes.

I cosponsored, fought for, and voted for a substitute Democratic budget that would have cut the deficit $303 billion over the next 3 years and $56.5 billion in fiscal 1986 alone. We were defeated 54 to 43.

The Office of Management and Budget claims this Reagan-Republican budget will cut the deficit $277 billion over 3 years—$26 billion less than the Democratic budget—and $55 billion in 1986—$1.5 billion less than the Democratic budget.

The Congressional Budget Office—a no-ax-to-grind, nonpartisan agency with a far better record than the Budget Office for accurate economic analysis—says the Reagan-Republican budget actually will cut the deficit by only $200 billion over 3 years—$103 billion less than the Democratic budget—and just $39 billion in 1986—$17.5 billion less than the Democratic budget.

Senate Republican Leader ROBERT DOLE said that the budget that would come before us was a watered-down, nothing budget.

He is right.

He just votes wrong.

I am going to vote against the budget conference report because it is a business-as-usual budget.

This budget is not the best that Congress can do to cut spending.

To ratify this budget is to tell the country that Congress does not want to do better, not that Congress can't do better.

For example, I can find over $23 billion in spending cuts I supported during consideration of the Senate budget resolution which are omitted from this budget.

These are the spending cuts which I supported which are left out of the business-as-usual budget:

First, 50-percent cut in general revenue sharing—$2.3 billion;

Second, freeze defense spending—$6 billion;

Third, Agriculture Program cuts totaling $6.6 billion; and Fourth, miscellaneous cuts I voted for, totaling $8.4 billion.

The list is not long, but it shows what can be done and what is within the capability of the Senate and the Congress to do to cut spending without injuring this country's essential priorities and needs.

In brief, Mr. President, these are the reasons why I cannot go along with the business-as-usual budget.

BUDGET RESOLUTION CONFERENCE: DEFEAT

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I will oppose the conference report on the first concurrent budget resolution for fiscal year 1986. I do so because it is neither large nor fair.

At the end of 1980, debt held by the public was $715 billion. Under President Reagan, that has more than doubled—this year the debt will be $1.5 trillion. And at the rate we are going by the end of this decade it will be $2.5 trillion.

This year we will spend $130 billion on interest alone. That is money that does not buy health care, school lunches, national parks—or defense. It is just money down a rathole.

The ever-growing Federal deficit looms over our economic future like a dark cloud. The need to borrow to finance our consumption drives up our interest rates, draws money from abroad and drives up the value of the dollar. In turn the overvalued dollar is the single largest contributor to our ever-growing trade deficit.

Our failure to make the hard decisions necessary to slash these deficits endangers economic growth. We are in serious danger of failing to pass on to our children what our parents bequeathed us: a higher standard of living.

Mr. President, I have voted in this body for packages including COLA freezes, tax increases, defense freeze, and domestic spending cuts. I would have supported difficult reductions in worthy programs—as part of a large and balanced package.

This package is neither. Strip away the assumed management savings, some of the odd assumptions in defense and shift to CBO accounting and this package cuts the fiscal year 1986 deficit by less than $40 billion. And it does so by slashing domestic discretionary spending.

Mr. President, I began the year advocating that we rapidly enact an across-the-board freeze and then discuss further deficit reduction. The package we are offered tonight cuts not more than the freeze would have and lacks its balance.

The time has come for the President of the United States to take responsibility for the results of his fiscal policy—huge deficits. The time has come for him to cool his rhetoric and admit that ideology is no substitute for arithmetic. In return, Members of my party are willing to accept cuts in programs we care deeply about. All of us must give some. The game is worth the candle, but leadership must come from both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue.

Let me conclude with one thought uttered by a clever man: Every time you pass a 1-year-old, you should thank him. Because, Mr. President, we are spending and charging it to our children and their children after them. Our failure to make the hard choices only burdens the next generation.

This package assumes any budget is better than none. I do not agree.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, this is an irresponsible budget because it does so little to reduce the deficit. But it would be even more irresponsible to do nothing. So with real reluctance I am voting for it.

Mr. BOREN. I agree with my colleague from Michigan, Mr. President. Passing this budget is better than doing nothing. However, it comes as close as possible to doing nothing. No one should be fooled into thinking that this budget seriously deals with the deficit crisis.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I applaud the conferees for bringing us the conference agreement on the budget resolution. If we are to achieve any deficit reduction this year, we need a budget. The conferees overcame some major obstacles, not the least of which was the unwillingness of the President to deal seriously with the deficit. The conferees in both Houses and on both sides of the aisle deserve credit for their perseverence and hard work.

The conference agreement before us is not perfect, but it will result in significant reduction in the budget deficits that are undermining the economic base of this Nation. And it will do that without cutting benefits to Social Security recipients. I said earlier this year that we could reduce the deficit while protecting Social Security benefits. I am glad to see that, despite the rhetoric of some, we can do just that.

This conference agreement will achieve about $55 billion in deficit reduction in 1986 and $277 billion over the next 3 years. If all the savings included in this budget are enacted, it will result in a deficit of $112 billion by 1988.

That deficit is too high for my liking. But it represents a significant improvement over the budget the President sent us in February. I would remind my colleagues that the President's budget, measured on a comparable basis, would have resulted in a deficit of $147 billion in 1988. So that budget makes much more progress in the war against the deficit than the budget the President sent us.

It is still not as great a reduction as I would prefer. In May, I offered on the floor a proposal that would have achieved greater deficit reduction—some $303 billion over 3 years—and resulted in a 1988 deficit of $100 billion, half of the projected deficit for this year. It would have protected the cost of living adjustments for Social Security and other programs and would have provided for essential investments in our future, such as education and research.

My budget amendment also would have redressed some of the inequities created by this administration's tax policies. By allowing for a minimum corporate tax, my amendment would have ensured that all corporations pay some income tax. As it stands now, there are some profitable corporations that pay no Federal income tax—make no contribution to reducing the budget deficit. Worse still, many of these same companies get tax refunds from the Government. Mr. President, it seems that at a time when we are asking many Americans to make some sacrifice to reduce the deficit, we should not let a few corporations off the hook.

As I have said, this conference agreement is not perfect. It contains some notable flaws that I will work to correct. But it is a major improvement over the version that passed the Senate in May. For instance, the Senate budget would have increased the out of pocket expenses for Medicare beneficiaries. The conference agreement, however, would achieve Medicare savings of some $1 billion without increasing beneficiary's costs. Also, many programs that had been slated for elimination—such as the Appalachian Regional Commission, Economic Development Administration, and others—have been retained, although at reduced funding levels. Funding for Amtrak has also been reduced by 15 percent. Fortunately, the drastic cuts made in the Senate-passed budget were rejected. These and other changes will allow the needs of our people to be met while still achieving major reductions in the budget deficit.

The conference agreement would provide for full COLA's for all the major retirement programs. The conference agreement assumes that Federal pay would be frozen for 1 year. Since Black Lung COLA's are tied to Federal pay raises, not to the consumer price index as Social Security and other COLA's are, this would result in those beneficiaries not receiving a COLA next year. I am sure that the conferees did not intend to single out those suffering from black lung disease for this unfair treatment. I will work with the Government Affairs Committee and the Labor Committee to try to rectify this situation. I hope that I would have the support of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to restore fairness to the treatment of the Black Lung Program.

I also wish to commend the conferees for the sensitivity they showed to the severe crisis in agriculture and rural America. They restored some $6 billion in reconciled cuts that were made in the Senate-passed budget. This will help us get a good farm bill that stays within the budget. We Democrats are committed to protecting farm income from further erosion. And this conference agreement will help us do that.

This budget agreement will not completely satisfy everyone. But is is an important element in our drive to reduce budget deficits. It does not go as far as I believe it should. I would prefer a budget that reduces the deficit far more and that restores some equity to our tax system. But I shall support this budget and continue my efforts to achieve a budget that significantly reduces the deficit, encourages sound economic growth, and is fair to all Americans.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, this budget contains the defense budget authority levels passed by the Senate as a result of an amendment I offered May 2. It was indeed a difficult undertaking to bring about a fiscal year 1986 defense budget authority level of, essentially, a freeze plus inflation.

The incessant response from the Department of Defense prior to passsage of my amendment was not only that a freeze would greatly imperil national security, but that any cut at all would imperial national security. Notwithstanding the propaganda, the Senate proceeded to freeze the defense budget in real terms, and the House in nominal terms. The House cut an additional $32 billion in outlays from defense, over 3 years, below the Senate figure. The conference committee put back $10 billion. Even the Defense Department got into the cost-cutting act when it "discovered" an extra $4 billion in its "coffee can."

The bottom line is that Congress has chosen to reduce the original DOD request by $106 billion in outlays over the next 3 years.

Now Mr. President, we should all recognize—we in Congress, the executive branch, and the public at large—that even after disciplining the defense budget to the extent we have, we have not "imperiled national security." The simple fact is, the defense budget was too fat. We had rampant inflation in the defense industry. Prices were rising fast, and output was falling just as fast. Hammers were costing $500, and on and on—we all know the horror stories.

What the defense budget needed was a good freezing, an old fashioned recession. Not that a freeze will reduce the cost of $500 hammers to what they should cost, or $45 million fighters to what they should cost, but that the freeze is a necessary first step. The recession we have created in the defense industry will cause an increase in awareness of the value of each dollar spent for defense. As with any economic recession, less money leads to more efficiency and more productivity.

For this reason, Mr. President, I believe the defense budget action taken by Congress this year will be therapeutic for our national defense. And best of all, it will oblige us as a nation to regard with great skepticism in the future the proposition that subsidizing the defense budget necessarily increases the security of our country.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I will vote for this conference report only because it beats doing nothing. It will provide greater fiscal discipline than if we had no budget resolution at all. Using the accounting assumptions of the Office of Management and budget, it projects a budget deficit in 1988 of $112 billion, which would be $30 billion lower than the President called for in his February budget. It cuts spending more than the President proposed in that budget.

But all this means is that the budget resolution conference report which we are voting on today is an improvement over the totally inadequate budget which the President submitted earlier this year. First of all, it leaves the budget deficit far too high. The projected deficit of $112 billion in 1988 would still be about twice the size of the deficit when President Reagan entered office in 1981.

Second, the budget resolution conference report is based on very optimistic assumptions. The nonpartisian Congressional Budget Office estimates that this budget resolution conference report will result in a deficit in 1988 of $161 billion instead of $112 billion.

Third, this budget resolution does not recognize that both fairness and significant, real deficit reduction will require an increase in revenues. In order for a substantial deficit reduction package to be fair, it must be based on the principle of shared sacrifice. A package which focuses almost entirely on spending cuts, leaves open the possibility that many profitable corporations and wealthy individuals who are currently sheltering their incomes from any taxes, will still be able to do that at the same time many other of our citizens will be asked to sacrifice as a result of budget cuts. That is not fair and that is why any deficit reduction package should include a strengthened minimum tax on corporations and individuals.

The absence of significant revenues also places a limit on the amount of deficit reduction possible. The Chiles-Hollings package which I supported called for almost $50 billion more in deficit reduction than does this budget resolution conference report, and revenues were key to that difference. This lost $50 billion is the difference between doing little more than treading water, which is represented by this conference report, and substantial deficit reduction, which was represented by the Chiles-Hollings package.

Mr. President, to paraphrase Winston Churchill, this budget resolution conference report is not the end of the beginning in the battle for substantial deficit reduction; it is not even the beginning of the end; but if we are constant in our concern about the disastrous effects of the deficit, then it can be the end of the beginning.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I vote "Nay." I do not support this budget resolution, because there is no resolution therein to a budget that now or in any time foreseeable will bring receipts and outlays into reasonable balance.

We know it can be done, and how to do it. Control every part of the budget: defense; domestic spending; entitlements; and taxes. The President and now the Congress have chosen not to do it. I choose not to join them in this budget resolution, that promises deficits of $180 billion next year and $160 billion 3 years out. That will bring us deficits much higher still if the business cycle does not disappear and another recession comes in the next 3 years. As it will.

I am gratified to see one new idea in this budget, a provision originally offered by myself and Senator LAUTENBERG in the Senate Budget Committee, to sell a portion of the Federal Government's $245 billion loan portfolio to private investors. This provision will reduce deficits by $3 billion over 3 years, and improve the management of Federal loans in the bargain. The proposal in the conference report is modest, but 10 percent of the pilot loan sale program we proposed on this floor last May, but it is a beginning.

It is not enough to make of this resolution much more than acquiescence to endless $200 billion deficits. To that I vote "Nay."

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I will vote against this budget. I commend the efforts of the budget conference and the hard work and energy that they and the Budget Committees have committed to this effort. But, unfortunately, hard work and commitment are not enough. I believe that we must meet our commitment to the American people for substantial deficit reduction. They look to the Congress for leadership—they expect it and deserve it. I do not believe that this budget fulfills that responsibility.

We are here at the end of a long negotiating road. In the closing minutes before the August recess, we have been presented a document that we are told will go a long way toward real deficit reduction. We are told that this is the best budget that is possible from this body. I disagree. This budget is not serious deficit reduction, it is a $37 billion not a $55 billion deficit reduction. The time to deal seriously with deficits is right now. Because what we are really doing here is avoiding the real problem of reductions by shifting an inordinate burden on a sector of Government that has already been hit hard in other parts of this budget.

I am very much opposed to a provision in this budget that would force State and local employees into the Medicare system effective January 1, 1986 and would also require that all new employees after January 1, 1986 be included in the Social Security system.

This new plan to include State and local employees in these systems will do considerable fiscal harm to both employer and employee. Massachusetts and its cities and towns will be profoundly affected by this provision. It will not only take money out of our employees paychecks, it will also take a great deal of money out of the overstrained coffers of our State and local governments.

Further, I can not support a budget which projects military spending of 3 percent increases after inflation in the out years, especially when domestic programs will be asked to absorb ever deeper cuts at the same time. If money alone could buy us the kind of national defense we needed, increases would make sense. But current defense programs are so fraught with waste, fraud and abuse in procurement as well as malfunctioning weapons systems, that we can not justify these ever increasing sums. They are commitments to buying more of the same. And I am bothered when the Secretary of Defense can find, overnight $4 billion in savings which did not exist the day before.

Military spending must be subjected to the same annual scrutiny every other program in our Federal budget meets.

Finally, there is far more room in the budget for revenues from tax compliance. I am pleased that compliance is included in the resolution and I am hopeful that it will be utilized to its full potential in the future.

Mr. President, having in the last few hours seen the details of the budget resolution, I must state that I am very much opposed to the provision which would force State and local employees into the Medicare system effective January 1, 1986 and would also require that all new employees after January 1, 1986 be included in the Social Security system.

Under current law, State and local government employee participation in Medicare and Social Security payroll taxes is not mandatory, therefore only 70 percent of these workers are covered by Medicare. To suddenly ask the remaining 30 percent of State and local workers to bear the burden of $8.4 billion in budget savings is unfair and surely disproportionate to the number of individuals involved.

The ability of State and local governments to pay the employer's share of the $8.4 billion to be raised will be extremely limited. In my own State for example, 2½ percent property tax limit would make it all but impossible for local government to meet the new commitment.

State and local governments do not pay lavish salaries. To enact this sudden change will certainly diminish the ability of these governments to provide responsible and attractive retirement systems. In the case of many State and local governments, a strong, modern retirement system is one of the key incentives which the governmental unit has to offer to attract quality people. Also, many of these governments will face constitutional restrictions prohibiting an unbalanced budget, because inadequate time has been provided for the additional revenue to be raised.

This proposal was not in the House or the Senate budget resolutions, nor has this proposal been given extensive consideration this year in any congressional hearings. A major change without adequate consideration is not a responsible way to legislate. Our States, communities and public servants do not deserve such a backdoor method on an issue that will so crucially touch their future.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I would like to comment just briefly on the budget resolution before the body. First of all, it should be viewed as a significant achievement that we have before us a budget resolution at all. Just a few short weeks ago that did not seem likely. Both the chairmen and ranking members of the House and Senate Budget Committees must be applauded for their diligence and perseverence in this matter.

Now I know that this budget resolution does not meet with everyone's satisfaction. In fact, it may meet no one's satisfaction. The deficits are still too large, the deficit reduction is not enough. But Mr. President, I believe that when looked upon in light of the realities facing the conferees over the past several weeks, and in particular the limitations placed upon a basic framework for agreement by the administration, this budget resolution accomplishes about all that could realistically be expected of it.

The prospect of $200 billion deficits for as far as the eye can see poses one of the greatest dangers to sustained economic growth, in my estimation, than any other economic consequence facing the Nation at this point. These deficits are clearly the result of the failed economic policies and outright economic folly propounded by the administration over the past several years. Let there be no mistake, contrary to whatever rationale used to justify these policies, deficits do matter.

Until this administration faces up to this proposition, or abandons the threat of veto, there is not much that Congress will be able to do to address this serious problem. Unless the administration faces up to this proposition soon, the economy will inevitably be buried under an avalanche of debt.

The budget resolution before us is not completely negative, however, and the positive aspects of it must be cited.

First, the budget process, however damaged, has produced a budget resolution.

Second, $55 billion in deficit reduction next year, and some $278 billion over the next 3 years is not an insignificant amount, although I fear that the actual reductions will be considerably less than assumed in this resolution. Nonetheless, we have achieved a degree of deficit reduction.

Third, the budget resolution does effectively protect the more than 36 million Social Security beneficiaries from unwarranted reductions in their cost-of-living benefits next year.

Fourth, this resolution effectively rejects the notion that certain programs, particularly economic development programs which have benefitted areas bypassed by the current economic recovery, no longer warrant Federal funding. The rejection of outright elimination of programs such as the Economic Development Administration, the Appalachian Regional Commission, and the Urban Development Action Grant Program, signals that the Federal Government is still committed to the enrichment of undeveloped areas of this Nation.

Fourth, the budget resolution does effectively provide a safety net under those programs which benefit the most needy in our society. It effectively rejects increases in out-of-pocket expenses for our elderly on Medicare, and protects participants in the important Women, Infants, and Children Program.

Fifth, the resolution rejects the notion that farmers, students, and low- and moderate-income homebuyers should bear more of the brunt of deficit reduction than they have already contributed. By rejecting the imposition of user fees on Government-sponsored enterprises such as Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac, Sallie Mae, and the Farm Credit System, we once again are the Federal Government's commitment to the encouragement of family farms, education, and homeownership. In essence, we confirm our commitment to increased opportunity for all of our citizens.

In sum, Mr. President, given the constraints and parameters prevelant during consideration of this budget, we have done as much as we can do given the insistence of the President that we could and should do more. But somehow, we must continue the defense buildup that has increased defense spending 50 percent in the last 4 years—and convince the White House that mounting Federal budget deficits do pose a serious threat to the economy. I support the general principles which I have outlined above and are contained in this budget resolution. My only regret is that we were precluded from pursuing further principles of equity, such as the imposition of a minimum corporate tax structure which ensures that all pay their fair share, which would have accomplished even greater deficit reduction than that contained here.

Thus, with grave reservations, I lend my support to this budget resolution.

BUDGET ACCORD AND BEYOND

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, almost 7 months ago to the day, a group of Republican Senators went to the Blair House to discuss the No. 1 domestic issue facing this Nation—the enormous and threatening Federal deficit. We decided, unanimously, to attack the problem head on by drafting a package of spending cuts that would cut the Federal deficit in half by 1988.

Today will not, and I repeat will not, be the culmination of that effort. But I have decided that this budget is better than no budget at all. This budget will be a step—a very small step—in the right direction.

The conference report on the fiscal 1986 budget fails to make the kind of savings we envisioned back in January, and we struggled months to achieve. What's more, it fails to address several of the critical fiscal issues we must eventually confront if we are ever to ensure long-term economic prosperity.

But it is a better product than the one passed by the House. And for this, I must give great credit to PETE DOMENICI and the other Senate budget conferees, who through their persistence, have brought us a conference agreement that could possibly save $277 billion over the next 3 years.

That total falls far shy of the $295 billion in savings in the original budget passed by the Senate, and woefully short of the $340 billion in deficit reductions that were part of the last Senate offer.

Nearly half of the savings in the final budget package will come from reductions in defense spending. And while the $68 billion in reconciled savings in the conference agreement almost doubles what was in the House-passed budget, it doesn't come close to the $135 billion in reconciliation savings in the original Senate budget plan.

The final budget plan eliminates about a half dozen minor programs, but it avoids many of the structural reforms which result in long-term savings and that were part of the Senate's budget.

The conferees did agree to the Senate's position on budget authority for defense, which means that, for the present, our revitalized military posture will remain secure.

The end result, if the conference agreement is carried out—and it is far from certain that the House will be willing or able to do that—in 1988, the deficit will be $112.1 billion.

THE FUTURE

I have been asked repeatedly over the past few days about how Republicans feel—do you feel abandoned, left out on a limb because of our stand and commitment on the deficit? Well, I think I can speak for most of my colleagues when I say that we know, and we believe that the American public knows, that the position we took when we voted for the Senate budget package on May 10, and our subsequent attempts at resolving the budget impasse, were the right and responsible ones. We made some extremely difficult choices in that budget—with one goal in mind—cutting that deficit so that the U.S. economy could continue to grow and expand.

There were others, this time around, who felt those choices were not necessary. Our differences have not been with President Reagan—he is committed to seeing the deficit reined in—but on how to achieve those deficit reductions.

Because, believe me, the deficit problem is not going to vanish. And while this budget package will make a contribution to the effort, come next January, we will have to face up to the deficit realities anew. Perhaps next time we will have more converts to the Senate Republicans' view.

Again, I want to offer a special and personal word of thanks to PETE DOMENICI, for his tireless efforts on seeking and achieving a budget. And to all of my Republican colleagues who have supported me and Senator DOMENICI, who were stalwarts in this year's budget battles, I also offer my thanks, and repeat the words of John Paul Jones spoken in answer to a demand for surrender, "I have not yet begun to fight."

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I reluctantly support the conference agreement reached on the budget resolution.

I support the agreement because it is so very important that some action be taken at this time to reduce the $200 billion plus deficit. I support it reluctantly because in my opinion the agreement does not reduce the deficit nearly enough.

While I admire the long and diligent efforts of members of the Budget Committees of the House and Senate to reach an agreement on the budget, I, like many of my colleagues, regret that more cannot be done to reduce this deficit that threatens to strangle our economy. Although both the House and Senate have passed more substantial deficit-reduction measures, the package before us today is a shell of what it should be. It is extremely unfortunate that more serious deficit-reduction efforts have been thwarted. And, I am concerned that we are passing up our best opportunity to reduce the deficit. As a result it is very likely that we will have a major deficit of growing magnitude facing us for as far as we can see into the future.

Everyone agrees that major economic problems confront and challenge us. The soaring domestic budget deficit is one of those problems, and the persistent trade deficit is another. Both threaten our economic security and our ability to compete in the international marketplace. Both must be brought under control as soon as possible.

The trade deficit, which reached a record $123 billion last year and promises to set a new record again this year, is fueled by our domestic deficit. The trade imbalance is stark evidence that our competitive position in the world economy is in decline as more and more of our products face foreign competition and many of our industries experience lost jobs and plant closings and slowdowns. While I am hopeful that we can regain our competitive edge and reverse our trade deficit, I am concerned that we cannot be successful if we do not do more now to reduce our domestic budget deficit.

The budget deficit hurts everybody. It creates the need for Government borrowing, thus keeping interest rates high. This makes foreign capital more attractive to U.S. markets and artificially drives up the value of the dollar relative to other currencies. Also, the money necessary to pay the interest on the huge national debt takes money from needed Government programs. This year alone we will pay more than $130 billion interest on the debt. It is estimated that by 1990 the interest on the national debt will nearly equal what we now spend on national defense.

Most of all, the deficit hinders our efforts to compete in the international marketplace. It increases the cost of our products overseas and threatens our economic growth. And it costs us jobs. Over time, the burden of the debt lowers our standard of living as more and more money goes to pay off the debt and not to more productive uses. By creating debt we not only hurt ourselves, but, worse, we hurt our children who eventually will have to pay the bill for our mismanagement.

Without question, these factors all contribute to our economic instability. In fact, in recent months leading economic indicators reflect a continued economic slowdown. Some have called this a temporary lull. But it can cause serious consequences if it continues.

In 2 of the last 3 months the index of economic indicators has shown extremely weak growth. The index is the main gauge of future economic activity and reflects a continued weakness in the industrial sectors of the economy. As a result of this slowdown the administration has recently revised its economic assumptions to reflect the reality of slower economic growth. As a result it is no longer possible to expect our deficit problem to be solved solely by economic growth.

This documented slowdown stemming from the U.S. budget deficit, high interest rates, the trade deficit, the dollar exchange rate, and the inflow of capital to the United States combine to create real fear of another recession.

As a Member of Congress I have attempted to support all fair and responsible efforts to reduce the deficit, including an across-the-board freeze at last year's levels. I did not support the Senate-passed version of the budget, however, because I did not feel it went far enough in reducing the deficit and it did not fairly share the burdens of deficit reduction. I hoped then that a stronger version would be shaped in conference. But now I have some of the same concerns about the conference package.

It is clear that all Americans must share the burden of lowering the deficit. While I think people are willing to share in the sacrifice, they want assurances that it will be shared fairly.

It is also clear that while now is our best opportunity to lower the $200 billion deficit, that opportunity is rapidly slipping away from us. The consequences could be disastrous.

While we agree that the deficit is serious, it is unfortunate that we cannot agree on how it should be reduced. Everyone has an inflexible attitude and refuses to compromise. Some refuse to raise taxes, others refuse to touch cost-of-living adjustments, and no one wants to reduce defense spending. The only way to come up with the needed savings is to put everything on the table. We need a comprehensive solution that perhaps touches all three areas. We need to consider raising taxes. And we need to consider holding the line on COLA's and on defense spending.

I am sincerely concerned, Mr. President, that because we cannot do more today, we are destined to reap a whirlwind tomorrow. I would like to think I am wrong, but the signs are not reassuring.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I support this budget conference report.

Certainly, I hoped for greater deficit reduction. I was on record early for freezing COLA's and raising some revenues. That's why I worked on a plan with the Senator from Washington, Mr. GORTON, during the Budget Committee markup and with the Senator from Oklahoma, Mr. BOREN, on another plan during Senate floor consideration. Both of those plans would have reduced the deficit more than the conference report before us now. I am convinced the adoption of either of those plans would have resulted in a balanced budget by 1990, because both of those plans required some give from every program of the Federal Government across the board, and in addition raised some revenues.

Unfortunately, the budget conference committee, of which I was a member, could not agree on such a budget plan. At least twice we were looking at balanced budget plans in the eye, but certain important players, like the President and the Speaker, blinked.

Despite all of that, I will vote for this conference report. The deficit reduction in fiscal year 1986 will be $55.5 billion. Over 3 years we intend $277.4 billion in reductions. That's exactly half way between the $295 billion in the Senate-passed resolution, and the $259 billion in the House-passed resolution; $68.3 billion in savings are reconciled which is also about half way between the House and Senate when COLA's are removed.

So it's not everything I hoped for, but I sincerely believe it is better than not passing a budget.

Mr. President, I want to express my admiration and appreciation to PETE DOMENICI and LAWTON CHILES, without whom we could not have accomplished all we did. Many others deserve our thanks, like BOB DOLE, David Stockman, BILL GRAY, DELBERT LATTA, and the other members of the budget conference committee. Finally, I want to express my admiration and respect to the many staff involved, especially Steve Bell and the staff of the Senate Budget Committee, who are so helpful, knowledgeable, and professional.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise to support the conference report on the budget, but I do so with misgivings.

The fact that we have a budget resolution at all maintains the integrity of the budget process. And the budget before us maintains a number of programs critical to my State. Yet, savings that could have been made, deficit reduction that could have been secured, were not. As a result, the budget plan before us falls short.

The deficit is like a cancer, Mr. President, that is plaguing our economy. The Congress has undergone the travail and the pain of major budget surgery, but we have failed to completely cure the problem. It will be with us next year, and we will have to cope with it, and make some of the hard choices that are not being made this year.

The budget before us calls for $56 billion in deficit reduction in the coming fiscal year, and $276 billion in savings over the next 3 years. It assumes a budget deficit of $172 billion next year, and $113 billion by 1988.

That is not enough, Mr. President, to bring confidence to financial markets. It is not enough to get the dollar down, so that we can sell goods abroad at competitive prices, and reduce the trade deficit. It is not enough to ensure the long-term health of our economy. Unfortunately, given the rosy economic assumptions that underlie the deficit projections in this budget, I am afraid that we will not even reach those targets.

When the Senate considered the budget resolution, I supported a plan that would have brought us well over $300 billion in deficit reduction. The budget deficit in 1988 would have been below $100 billion. That would have been a bigger step than the one we take today toward deficit reduction. It was a plan that, notwithstanding significant reductions, would have saved programs critical to my State and the Nation.

I am pleased to note that many of these programs survive in the budget plan approved by the conference. Superfund toxic waste cleanup is budgeted at the levels approved by the Environment and Public Works Committee in which I serve. This is the same level that I had proposed in the Senate Budget Committee. This increase will not affect the budget deficit, as it will be offset by dedicated taxes on industry.

The plan preserves Federal support of Amtrak and mass transit at 15 percent below current funding, and preserves funding of the urban development action grant program at 20 percent below current levels. These programs, which are critical to the economic welfare of my State, were slated for elimination by the administration. I had sought a freeze in funding in an amendment on the Senate floor. Instead, the Senate adopted a 40-percent cut in Amtrak, a 20-percent cut in mass transit, and slated UDAG for elimination. In the face of such action, the preservation of these programs at the levels approved by the conference must be considered a victory.

The budget plan also removes reconciliation of the sale of Conrail. I had sought assurances from the Secretary of Transportation that she would not seek legislation providing for the sale of Conrail under the procedural constraints of a reconciliation. I argued in the Senate Budget Committee that the concerns of New Jersey and the other States of the Northeast and Midwest deserved a full and fair debate on the floor of the Senate. This is too important an issue to fast-track under conditions that deprive Members of their rights to fully debate a measure and to amend it. I am pleased that this point of view has prevailed.

Mr. President, a key element of this conference report is the preservation of the cost-of-living adjustment in Social Security. I consistently and strongly opposed the effort by Senate Republicans and approved by the administration to delay or cut the cost of living adjustment for our elderly. While we were granting a cost of living adjustment to our generals for the management of our military, the Senate would have denied relief from inflation to the elderly. I am pleased that this budget allows the Congress to keep its promise to the elderly of our Nation, that their Social Security would not be used to correct fiscal mistakes of the administration that has brought us these crushing deficits.

Lastly, I am pleased to note that the conference report incorporates a budget reform on Federal credit programs that is closely related to a proposal that my colleague from New York [Mr. MOYNIHAN] and I proposed in the committee and on the floor. We had proposed the pilot sale of loan assets, to reduce the deficit, to impose greater efficiency in the management of loan programs, and to clarify the true cost of Federal credit programs.

The conference report proposes that as new rural housing loans are issued, they shall be sold off to the private sector. First, we will recognize the payback of the loans promptly, at a time when we need the income. Second, we will recognize the true cost of these loans—the difference between the amount loaned, and the present value of the receivable. I am pleased that the conference has taken this significant step, and that its successful trial will provide a basis for adopting the broader proposal that Mr. MOYNIHAN and I advocated.

Mr. President, the budget before us is by no means a perfect budget. The Nation faces a grave economic threat as a result of the fiscal mismanagement of the last few years. Without the budget before us, the problem would get even worse. But, because of the shortcomings of this budget, the problem will be with us next year. I am committed to continue to work in the Budget Committee and in the Senate to reform our fiscal policies, to get the deficit down, and to put our economy on the footing that will ensure prosperity in the future.

TOO LITTLE, TOO LATE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, here we are, literally at the last minute, considering a budget resolution. This budget has come to us by a tortuous route, and it looks it.

Members of the Budget Committee tried. The conference had more ups and downs than a roller coaster. Their efforts made those of Sisyphus look half-hearted.

But they failed. This conference report serves one purpose—it defuses public blame for our not having passed a budget. It does not significantly reduce the deficit. It will be around $200 billion in 1986, about the same level as in 1985. Deficits in the outyears are likely to be considerably higher because this economic recovery has seen its best days.

How can I say this when the resolution estimates that the deficits will be somewhere between $180 and $112 billion? This resolution is still based on optimistic economic assumptions about unemployment, GNP growth, and interest rates. Take GNP growth as an example. The resolution assumes a growth rate of about 4 percent after adjusting for inflation. Most economists are now saying growth in 1985 will be somewhere between 2.5 to 3 percent.

Sometime this month both the CBO and the OMB will revise their economic projections to take account of the slower economic growth we have already experienced this year. This one adjustment will add $15 to $20 billion to the 1986 deficit. In other words, about one-half the advertised cut in the resolution will be wiped out by this one adjustment.

Then some of the cuts in spending will disappear. The cut in defense outlays is nothing but a figment of someone's imagination. Some "new financing mechanism" will turn out to cost money, not save it. And next summer, when we get around to passing supplemental appropriations bills, the ceilings set in this resolution will be long forgotten.

Add these factors and the cuts in the deficit evaporate. The one thing that will not disappear will be the $200 billion that we will have added to the national debt.

Mr. President, I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to a study done by the Congressional Research Service entitled, "Federal Deficits, Debt and the National Economy." This study is a sobering analysis of the dangers posed by such debt.

These include:

First. By 1990, foreign investors will have to be willing to buy our debt to the tune of $200 billion a year. If they are not willing to do so, then the Federal Government will have to double its domestic borrowings, driving out of the credit markets farmers, small businessmen, and home buyers.

Second. We will join Mexico, Brazil, and Argentina on the list of nations with staggering international debts. As citizens of those countries are discovering, dealing with that debt means a significantly lower standard of living.

Third. Interest payments on the debt will explode. Making these payments will mean draconian cuts in spending and a whopping big tax increase.

These dangers are real. They will not be dispelled by a budget resolution which is little more than a placebo. That is why I am voting against this budget. It is too little, too late.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, it is hard to be enthused with this conference report. The byproduct of limited options, the conference report on the fiscal year 1986 first budget resolution is flawed. To those of us who supported passage of the budget when it was approved last spring, it is distressing to see the historic work of the Senate rendered meaningless by those who care so little about the consequence of budget deficits.

I am told by some that half a loaf is better than none at all, that a bird in the hand is better than two in the bush, that $277 billion in deficit reduction is less than $330 billion, but better than nothing at all. And, that may be true. But, when one looks at the mirrors used to produce the so-called $277 billion in savings, it is difficult to see what is real and what is illusion.

The simple fact of the matter is that the President and the House of Representatives took a look at the painful choices made by the Senate and wished there was a less painful way to reduce the deficit. They got together, compared wish lists, and wished for 4 percent real growth in GNP over the next 4 years, 5 percent rates on 3-month Treasury bills, and a number of other unrealistic economic conditions. They wished they could avoid making meaningful reforms in Federal programs by freezing spending on every program—except for those with a political constituency. And they wished they could muddle through one more budget resolution without having to compromise on defense spending, without having to compromise on Social Security, without having to make the tough decisions that have to be made to reduce the god-awful deficit.

Unfortunately, when the House of Representatives and the administration discovered that the Senate would not go along with their wishful thinking, that we were going to force them to make some difficult choices, they cut us, and future generations, out of the deal. The President got runaway defense spending. The Speaker got runaway entitlement spending. Our children got runaway deficits. But, without additional revenues, after you set aside defense, interest payments, Social Security and Medicare, there is not much left for the future.

One of the few—but consequent—failures that history will assign to the Reagan administration is its misguided belief that a healthy economy can be sustained in a competitive world on spending increases and revenue cuts. The efforts to reduce domestic spending and increase defense spending while simultaneously cutting tax revenue has created such a demand on the world investment to satisfy U.S. demand for debt financing that our heralded economic recovery is slowly grinding to a halt under the pressures of import competition, export degradation and high cost of capital investment. And the consequences for even greater deficit and for debt-demand is inevitable. The revenue projections in this conference report are so unrealistic as to be possibly deceitful. The economy is not growing at a 4-percent clip and hasn't been for the last two quarters. Revenue projections for fiscal year 1985 are way behind estimates a year ago. OMB has already reduced its estimate of revenue from income taxes—especially corporate taxes—for fiscal year 1986 by $20 billion.

Besides economic problems, their are other problems facing this country which are implicit in the conference report's commitment to unrealistic deficits.

With deficits as large as those contained in this conference report, Ronald Reagan may be right when he says we can't afford anything new. In his 8 years in office, President Reagan will have increased the national debt from $850 billion to $2.5 trillion. And the annual debt service will be more than triple to $155 billion per year and rising in fiscal year 1988. With a $2.5 trillion national debt, we won't be able to afford taking action on acid rain, ground water protection, or on our failing infrastructure.

Mr. President, if it sounds like this conference report bothers me, it's because it does. This conference report represents a tragic failure on the part of this Nation's elected representatives to do what has to be done. We can't effectively freeze ourselves out of a deficit, and we shouldn't kid ourselves into trying.

The Senate's original resolution contained an across-the-board freeze on spending in which every beneficiary of Federal spending participated equally—except the truly needy. But the truly greedy went to work on the House side and in the administration and equity was forced out the window. The Senate had the courage to vote to eliminate 13 Federal programs. The House agreed on only one. The Senate provided a $100 billion deficit in 1988 including 3 percent real growth in defense spending with the expectation the House would take that particular function down even further from the President's request for 6 percent real growth. But the administration and the House cut a deal—the President got what he could settle for in defense and the House got what it wanted in domestic spending cuts—almost none. After you take advantage in this budget resolution of $11 billion in Medicare hospital insurance spending reductions much of which the Secretary of HHS had already accomplished by regulation; and after you consider the fact the House raised revenues from user fees by almost $16 billion; you have a reduction in domestic spending in the "peanuts" category.

But, Mr. President, I will support my courageous Senate Republican leadership and vote for the conference report. I feel like the better team lost the seventh game of the World Series. But we were up against the other league and all the umpires on this one.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I am pleased the conferees have reached an agreement on a budget resolution for fiscal year 1986, which begins October 1. The conferees have worked long hours to achieve this compromise and deserve much credit for their tenacity.

Before supporting the resolution, I would like to make a few general observations concerning it.

First, I am elated that the budget resolution calls for no new taxes. Make no mistake about it, the Federal Government suffers not from a lack of revenues, but from an inability to control its spending habits. In fact, tax increases will not reduce the deficit. Every tax dollar that comes to Washington, and then some, is spent. The only way to reduce the deficit is with fair and meaningful reductions in Federal spending.

Second, while the resolution calls for deficit reduction of $55 billion in fiscal year 1986, and $276 billion over 3 years, I do not believe this resolution will produce the intended, and much needed, deficit reductions. As I just stated, the only way to reduce the deficit is through meaningful, but fair, fundamental reform of spending programs. The old trick of spending restraint by smoke and mirrors will not fool anyone. Institutional spending reform must be accomplished if deficit reduction is to be achieved. I hope Congress will use the targets or guidelines in the resolution as a floor for deficit reduction rather than a ceiling. Along those lines, I am pleased to support my friend from Colorado, Mr. ARMSTRONG's call for further deficit reduction measures. Greater deficit reduction than called for in this resolution is needed. The deficit must be reduced in order for the favorable performance of the economy to continue. However, tax increases would be counterproductive since they retard economic growth and worsen the deficit problem.

To assure that these targets in the budget resolution are floors, and to achieve greater budgetary savings as Congress implements the resolution, I intend to offer amendments to the upcoming appropriations bills to reduce spending across the board. Such an approach is fair to all and will produce the much-needed additional savings.

Mr. President, we must not mislead the public or ourselves by thinking we have achieved a fiscal miracle by passing this budget resolution. It is better than no budget resolution, but just barely. Our job is not done. In fact it has only begun. Enactment of a resolution is only the starting point of the budget process. I challenge my colleagues in implementing the budget resolution to work for greater budgetary savings than is called for by the resolution. Only then can the deficit be reduced to a level that does not threaten continued economic growth.

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, the conference report before us is the product of many hours of discussion and debate. It represents not a perfect utopian solution to the fiscal crisis we find ourselves in, but rather a document forged out of the give and take of the democratic process.

Therefore, there are provisions of this report that I do not agree with—there are items that if isolated for a single vote, I would surely oppose. The reality, however, is that we seldom make decisions in this body in a vacuum. Indeed, the very nature of the budget process forces us to take a broad view. We must look not only at line items, but at the way the entire package affects the level of Federal spending over the next few years.

We vote on this conference report in the context of a national debt that is well over $1.5 trillion. Last year, 13 percent of the total budget had to be set aside just to pay the 111 billion dollars' worth of interest on this debt. In fact, we are now paying more in interest every year than we did on the entire budget just 25 years ago!

What is perhaps even more astounding is that during the past 50 years Congress has increased taxes nearly 200 times. And as revenues have increased so has the budget. As a percent of the gross national product the budget has gone from 18.5 percent in 1960, to 20 percent in 1970, and to 23 percent in 1980. Today it stands at over 25 percent, and if one includes the spending of State and local governments that figure approaches nearly 40 percent of GNP.

Mr. President, I have represented the people of Kentucky in the U.S. Senate for just over 200 days. My tenture has been brief compared to that of many of my colleagues, but it has become abundantly clear that there is no greater issue facing the U.S. Congress than the Federal deficit.

I am encouraged that the budget resolution we debate tonight represents the largest deficit reduction in the history of the Congress—as it should, since we are faced with the largest deficit this Nation has ever seen. If fully enacted, this version of the budget will provide savings of $276 billion over the next 3 years.

Mr. President, I will support this conference report, not because it is perfect but because it does an equitable job of exacting substantial deficit reduction. I have no illusions that what is before us is a solution to the deficit problem; it is nothing more than a beginning and in some respects not even a very good beginning.

I would suggest to my colleagues, however, that the time has come to at least begin—we must show those we represent that we have the courage and political will to tackle the tough issues. I know that those that I have the high honor and privilege of representing demand no less.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the conference report now before us on the first concurrent resolution on the budget, leaves me with an empty feeling and with a feeling of frustration. We have been promised that we would be able to save about $55 billion with the first resolution, but my analysis leads me to believe that this conference report leads in the same direction that so many other budgets adopted by the Congress have led. The estimate of the Congressional Budget Office is that this package of budget proposals would save only $39 billion. More than that, we are told that part of the deficit reduction will come through the imposition of user fees for certain Government services; yet I know from experience that the Congress, when it comes time to vote for those user fees in a legislative package, will not agree to bite the bullet and make such reductions. I am still awaiting the passage of a large package of user fees that were assumed in the budget 3 years ago.

The Senate is being asked to vote for new taxes as a part of this resolution. Admittedly the amount of tax increases requested in this report is small compared to previous years, but it is a bad principle to accept, given the record of previous years. We have raised taxes a great deal in the last few years, and we are still facing $220 billion deficit for fiscal year 1986. In 1982, I was told that I only had to agree to 98 billion dollars worth of new taxes over 3 years in order to guarantee three times that amount in spending reductions. Instead we ended up with $100 billion in additional spending.

Mr. President, I make a clear distinction between raising taxes and reducing spending to reduce the deficit for strong economic and political-economic reasons. Let me address the last issue first by saying that raising taxes has only tempted Congress to spend more money. This is the record of the late 1970's when inflation drove taxpayers into higher brackets and produced more revenue. This process reached its zenith in fiscal 1980 when Federal outlays increased by 17 percent. Let me now address the economic reason.

The heart of the matter is that Federal spending is the best indicator of the damage caused by our fiscal policy. Federal spending is the key because it is the best measure of the fiscal disincentives imposed on the private sector by the Federal Government. In the long run, it makes only a small difference whether we finance spending by raising taxes or borrowing funds, as long as we do not expect to do so forever. Increased taxes discourage work and investment, and, likewise, borrowing discourages both investment and consumption by raising interest rates. Each takes resources out of our economy for use by the Federal Government, often for programs that are of questionable value. So the size of the deficit simply tells us how Congress and the administration have chosen to fund Federal spending and not how damaging fiscal policy is to the economy.

A better measure of the burden of fiscal policy, as I have said, is the total amount of Federal spending. We ought to measure the number of jobs destroyed, the number of businesses closed, and the amount of income removed from the economy by Federal spending. Yet, this is an aspect of fiscal policy often overlooked. Recent years, of course, have seen a resurgence of concern about either the negative impact of high tax levels or the damaging effects of deficit spending. Nevertheless, very few concerned commentators in Washington focus their attention on the force that drives both of these variables—Federal spending.

Mr. President, even if the resolution now before us met the criteria that I felt were appropriate for reducing the deficit, there remains one more problem that has to be addressed concerning the true value of the budget process. What bothers me is the simple fact that in the last 5 completed fiscal years, the Congress has overspent its own first resolution by $28 billion a year. What does it mean to struggle over the resolution, attract so much attention to our efforts, and still start the next fiscal year's budget considerations in January with a $220 billion deficit once again. It seems to me that this has been the record of the last few years. We pass a resolution, make promises to control spending, and then promptly ignore them. The people of this Nation must be asking themselves how it can work out like this mathematically year after year. It could lead to a severe loss of confidence in those of us now in office. Before that happens, let me ask my colleagues to consider some reform of their own thinking and eventually a reform in the entire budget process. It is not now functioning.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, before we close off this debate on the budget resolution, I extend a special word of thanks to our Democratic staff on the Budget Committee. They have worked extremely hard over the long months it has taken us to get a budget. They have been here nights and weekends, analyzing the various proposals that have come from the administration, from each party in the Senate, from the House and from various Senators. They have of course used their analytic capabilities to develop our own proposals to reduce the deficit in a responsible way. The Senate and the public owe them a debt of gratitude for putting out clear information about difficult budget issues. Throughout the process, they have performed cheerfully and competently and we thank them for their efforts.

I also thank two Presidential management interns who worked long and hard for us earlier in the year, Norman Chlosta of EPA and Kristin Faust of the SEC; as well as Geena Cohen and Jon Moyle, who did a fine job in their summer internships on the Budget Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. CHILES. I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I want to thank all Members for their patience over the past several months. We have been talking about the budget for probably too long. I particularly want to thank members of the Budget Committee and members of the budget conference; and, again, the distinguished chairman of the committee, PETE DOMENICI, and the distinguished ranking Democrat on the committee, LAWTON CHILES. There have been times when we were frustrated and angry, we did not know which way to turn, and I think the constant meetings and communication on both sides of the aisle is the only reason we are here this evening.

This is a budget resolution passed by the Congress. The President does not have to sign it. He does not have to say whether he is for or against it. But, again, I want to indicate, in case anyone is in doubt, the only inference I have from a long meeting with the President is that he supports the resolution.

That does not mean he is not going to criticize deficits. That does not mean he is not going to criticize those who want to increase taxes. That does not mean he might not like a better package.

This is the only package. He does not have to vote with his signature. He does not have to sign this document. I can say that the President is not opposed to this and if you are not opposed to it, the opposite is you support it. I could not get any other inference.

Mr. President, I think it is time we vote. Obviously, we could all find different ways to reach different results, better results, but I am not nearly as excited about this vote as I was the one on May 10. I do not think PETE WILSON is either or PETE DOMENICI or anyone else.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DOLE. You are looking better, too.

[Laughter.]

But in any event, here we are. It is time to make a judgment. I hope, as the distinguished Senator from Alaska just stated, that we have broad bipartisan support, primarily for the reason that I think most of these reductions are supported pretty much on both sides of the aisle.

I hope this is a step. It is not a big step; it is a small step, but it is a right step. I again thank the distinguished chairman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Nebraska have a moment to put his statement into the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, first I want to thank the chairman of the Budget Committee and the ranking member, and the rest of the conferees for their tireless work and efforts on producing a budget compromise and returning here with the document. They tried and they did their best.

In the opinion of this Budget Committee member, this document is such a far cry from what all had envisioned or hoped for to arrest runaway deficits and begin to reduce the reliance upon unrestrained borrowing that is driving the national debt to over the $2 billion milestone, or millstone, that it is hardly worthy of favorable consideration.

The numbers are full of fluff and optimistic as opposed to realistic figures and projections. If this budget produces annual deficits of much under $200 billion, it will be a miracle.

As budgets go, this one is like kissing your sister—it lacks any passion toward success.

This budget is like new Coke—it is not the real thing.

But what were the negotiators to do when the key players of the President and the Speaker of the House torpedoed any chance of meaningful success?

I will vote for this conference report not because I believe it to be a good one, but in the final analysis, it probably is better than no restraint at all.

At least this document begins to address the terrible and totally unrealistic restraints placed on agriculture in our May action.

The main reason I hesitatingly support this is that it takes a step toward giving us some increased flexibility by billions of dollars in writing a farm bill that will not further devastate agriculture, but unfortunately, not enough to solve its problems.

Mr. WILSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No time remains.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 30 seconds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader for his kind observance that I am looking better on this occasion.

That night when I came in to vote I was on a gurney. Tonight it seems to me that what we are voting on should be on a gurney. I want to add, however, that I think it is the best that the distinguished chairman and the ranking member could do, given the opposition they were facing with the House.

I feel better physically. I do not feel better spirtually. I do congratulate them on their efforts.

I would agree with those who said that this is not the last step; it is a very small first one.

Mr. DOLE. This would be the last vote until 4 p.m. on September 9.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to concur in the House amendment to Senate Concurrent Resolution 32.

The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON Announced that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 67, nays 32—as follows:

NOT VOTING—1

Goldwater

So the motion to concur in the House amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to concur in the House amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHILES and Mr. GORTON moved to lay the motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, Mark Twain once said that its easier to stay out of debt than get out of debt. The events of the last weeks and months prove that Twain's wisdom endures along with his wit.

Mr. President, I rise to address my colleagues, becasue we voted today to make a down payment on our Nation's debt. The plan we approved will cut the deficit by $39 billion next year and by $200 billion in the next 3 years. It wasn't enough. Our future is still mortgaged. But we have made a start.

We could have done more. The problem is immense. It staggers the imagination. I actually draw gasps of wonderment when I try to describe the magnitude of our problem to Vermont taxpayers.

I still have trouble believing this example myself. All of the Federal taxes paid by all of the citizens of my State of Vermont last year would only pay for 2 days of interest—that's interest only—on the national debt. Our taxes don't pay for programs like national defense or Social Security. Fifteen percent of all the taxes collected in the United States—is just the interest penalty for our profligate ways.

The budget we have approved is fair. Social Security Cost of Living Adjustments are kept intact. Defense spending is allowed to grow after inflation in 1987 and 1988, and guaranteed student loans and the child nutrition programs are maintained pretty much at current levels. Any reductions will not affect the delivery of services.

The farm program is cut by $8 billion, but it survives after attempts to put every small farmer in America out of business failed. Amtrak, schedule for derailment by the administration, a consumer service, survives, with a 15-percent cutback. The Small Business Administration, an agency that creates jobs and helps the eoncomy of rural States like mine, was saved from being eliminated altogether.

So we have a budget we can live with. But can our children and grandchildren live with it?

Our future, their future, depends on our decision to continue what we did today, and more. Decisions that will leave our children with a chance to grow and prosper. We must plan that future of promise, for the alternative is surely one of debt and dependence.

We can continue to spend, and send the bill to future generations of Americans. Or we can get this country back on the road to the frugality that is part of my own Vermont-Yankee tradition.

I cosponsored a budget plan this year that would have balanced the budget by 1990. Deficits would have been reduced by almost $400 billion, more than twice the savings of the budget we did approve.

That budget plan was tough. Too tough, I guess. Domestic spending would have been cut by $90 billion. Defense spending would have been reduced by $72 billion in 1986. Real growth would have occurred in defense during 1987 and 1988.

I had to swallow deep cuts in programs that are important to my State. Unless we get the deficits under control, we'll just have to cut to the point where Government fails to provide the basic security, services and programs that all Americans need.

The more the debt grows, the more dollars in the budget will go to interest payments. And interest only buys time, and time costs money—more money than we can any longer afford.

Our national debt limits our choices. It takes away our very freedom.

Americans have the courage to accept what we must have the courage to accomplish. Today was a start. Let's not proclaim it a solution.

THE POSSIBILITY OF PROPOSALS TO SELL ADVANCED ARMS TO JORDAN AND SAUDI ARABIA

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, just over a month ago, this body debated an amendment calling on the President to refrain from selling advanced weaponry to Jordan until that nation and Israel agree to a peace treaty. The opponents on this amendment stated that there were already sufficient provisions regarding this issue and that in any case, the King of Jordan needed to know that the United States is his friend. The opponents argued that the provision of $250 million in economic aid was a litmus test of U.S. support for Jordan that should not be encumbered by expressions of U.S. concern about the ultimate outcome of one of the most critical problems of the region.

I remember this amendment well because it was mine and because it was soundly defeated. In all fairness, many of my colleagues who are staunch supporters of a strong American-Israeli relationship voted against my amendment because they had participated in structuring the Jordanian econimic aid package, believed that Israel was adequately protected, and did not want to rock the boat by adding another safeguard. Also, in all fairness, I must say that the July 24, 1985, release by the Reagan administration of its Middle East arms sales study—the basis for a request for major advanced weapons sales to Jordan and Saudi Arabia that is expected in September—has led me to tell my colleagues "I told you so."

Clearly, in contemplating the proposal of advanced weapons sales to Jordan and Saudi Arabia, the administration is ignoring the safeguards that the supporters of the Jordan economic aid package thought that they had put in place. The fact of the matter is that the Reagan administration has pursued a consistent and single-minded strategy in the Middle East. This strategy has been in place since the beginning of the Reagan administration and it is based on two principles: The deemphasis of the Camp David accords and the attempt to carry the favor of the so-called more moderate of Israel's enemies through econimic aid and arms sales packages.

Mr. President, this strategy is based on several faulty assumptions and if it continues to be pursued, I have no doubt that the fragile peace that exists in the Middle East will soon come crashing down around us. The first faulty assumption is that the United States somehow needs to prove itself to Jordan and Saudi Arbia. This "litmus test" approach does not include any attempt to put Jordan and Saudi Arbia on record as supporting key United States interests in the region, particularly with regard to Israel. The term "Camp David accords" dropped out of President Reagan's vocabulary very early on in his administration.

Mr. President, I think I speak for a substantial portion of this body when I say I am tired of these litmus tests. The United States' interests in the Middle East have been clear for years, and we don't need to prove our intentions to anyone or to any nation. We want a just and lasting peace in the Middle East for all nations in the region. Three courageous statesmen of three starkly different nations joined together just a few years ago to establish a framework for this peace. That framework was called the Camp David accords, and it is long past time for President Reagan to put aside his party differences with President Carter and admit that that framework is a darn good one.

The second faulty assumption is the Reagan administration's belief that somehow you can strengthen the United States' position in the Middle East by weakening Israel's military position vis-a-vis its enemies in the region. The keystone of the United States' strength in the Middle East is a strong alliance between the United States and Israel. Let their be no doubt that our strengthening of Jordan and/or Saudi Arabia will leave Israel scrambling to recoup the ground that we have caused it to lose. Such an action on our part is foolish during even the best of economic times, but when you consider the current plight of the Israeli economy, the contortions that military aid to Jordan or Saudi Arabia will put Israel through are certainly not worthy products of an alliance.

The Reagan adminstration's third faulty assumption about the realities of the Middle East is that Jordan's security does not depend on a strong Israel. If it were not for Israel, it is my strong belief that Jordan would not exist today as we know it. Certainly, King Hussein would not be the leader of whatever might be left of Jordan if Israel somehow vanished from the region. Whatever arms the Reagan administration might want to sell to Jordan will not change this relationship. A weakening of Israel is a strengthening of Syria. A strengthening of Syria is a weakening of Jordan as well as Israel. A recognition of this simple fact by Jordan—and by the Reagan administration, as well—would hopefully lead King Hussein to recognize that his nation's security is inextricably and unavoidably intertwined with the security of Israel. Given this fact, the logical position of the Jordanian Government would be the acceptance of the Camp David accords as the best means for pursuing the mutual security interests of all nations in the region that are truly interested in lasting peace and stability in the Middle East.

Mr. President, the continuation of Middle East policymaking on the basis of these faulty assumptions will lead the United States to continue to tread water while the Soviet Union and Syria make rapid gains. Our investment in the Middle East seen in terms of our economic and military aid to Israel and Egypt is only about $6.5 billion. We just sent to the President for his signature a Defense Department authorization bill in excess of $302 billion. What a bargain we are getting in the Middle East—for about 2 percent of what we spend on our defense budget we protect our lifeline to that critical area. Let's stop undermining our own investment. Arms sales to Jordan and Saudi Arabia can only help the United States under one set of circumstances—the acceptance by those nations of Israel's right to exist and the acceptance of the Camp David accords as the only means for establishing a just and lasting peace in the Middle East.

TRIBUTE TO THE BUREAU OF ALCOHOL, TOBACCO, AND FIREARMS INVESTIGATION OF THE ABORTION CLINIC BOMBINGS

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to a relatively unheralded group of law enforcement professionals at the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms [ATF]. The results of their diligent efforts are not only remarkable, but they serve as examples to which others may aspire.

Over the last few years, our country has been tormented by a series of bombings and arsons directed at abortion clinics. These attacks have resulted in countless disruptions of lives and physical damage in excess of $4.6 million dollars. The responsibility for investigating these criminal acts is that of the Treasury Department's Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms.

Although my opposition to the choice of abortion is well known, we can never allow such terrorist methods in our country. Since 1982, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms has served notice to those who resort to criminal behavior. Their efforts have solved 25 out of 35 bombings and arsons nationwide. Thirteen individuals have been convicted and sentenced to serve terms in prison. Ten of these criminals have received sentences of at least 10 years in length.

ATF's unsurpassed expertise in the field of explosives and arson investigaton has been demonstrated time and again. During a 21-minute period last Christmas, explosions destroyed three clinics in Pensacola, FL. ATF immediately responded by dispatching a highly qualified team of special agents, forensic chemists, and explosives technicians to the sites. Within days, ATF agents apprehended four suspects, charging them with Federal explosives and conspiracy violations. All four have been convicted for their roles in the scheme. Two of the individuals received 10-year prison terms for their part in these crimes.

In January, ATF, special agents ended a series of 10 bombing and arson attacks aimed at abortion-related facilities throughout Maryland, Delaware, Virginia, and the District of Columbia. Three men were arrested, culminating an intense investigation undertaking which involved laboratory analysis, round-the-clock surveillances, and countless interviews. Based upon overwhelming evidence gathered by ATF, two of the suspects admitted involvement in the conspiracy, and the third individual was found guilty following a jury trial and ordered to serve a 10-year sentence.

ATF's efforts have unequivocally dispelled the much-publicized theory that the violence was the result of a national conspiracy. While some physical evidence indicates that some incidents committed in specific geographic areas are related, the only common thread in all of the attacks appears to be a deep-seated, antiabortion sentiment carried to violent extremes.

There will always be those who seek to advance their cause through the use of violence. I firmly believe, however, that ATF's impressive record will serve as a deterrance to future criminal activity. It is in recognition of their accomplishments that I urge my colleagues to join me in commending the continuing dedication and professionlism of men and women of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms.

MIRACLES THROUGH MEDICINE

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, at a time when the Nation's health system is being rocked with ever-escalating health care costs, the possible insolvency of the Medicare Program, and administration cutbacks affecting not only Medicare and Medicaid but basic research, I am grateful that California can offer hope: The City of Hope National Medical Center and Beckman Research Institute, which for over 70 years has been dedicated to quality and compassion in patient care, research, and education in catastrophic diseases.

The soul of the medical center is its ability to provide its patients with the latest life-saving equipment in a warm and homelike setting. Free treatment is provided to individuals who cannot afford it and the research carried on is world renowned. In sum, the City of Hope is a model hospital whose services and research efforts are in the vanguard in the war against disease.

The City of Hope began in two tents; it has developed into one of the preeminent forces in the world's health care delivery scene. And the miracle is that its humanitarian efforts are still going on with unabated success, even in these financially strained times.

I am pleased to share with my colleagues the keynote address by the City of Hope's executive director, Ben Horowitz, given at the center's 1985 biennial convention. I ask unanimous consent that his speech be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

KEYNOTE ADDRESS BY EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR BEN HOROWITZ

Ladies and gentleman, members of the City of Hope family.

Welcome to the 1985 Biennial Convention!

The men and women gathered in this room represent the leadership of our auxiliaries throughout America. You have been elected as delegates to fulfill special responsibilities. According to our Constitution and Bylaws, you will be reviewing our organizational activities during the past two years and setting the direction for the next two years.

It can be solemnly stated, however, that the deliberations of every Convention place an indelible mark on the long range progress of the City of Hope. So it will be with this Convention.

It is appropriate that the Convention open in a festive mood. It reflects the warm kinship we feel for each other as members of the City of Hope family. It reflects the fact that we need each other, for the sum total of our accomplishments makes possible the giant strides of the City of Hope. It reflects our joy that the auxiliary movement has raised record-breaking funds since the last Convention.

Yes, tonight is a gala occasion for, in truth, it is a victory celebration!

In the sessions to come, we will turn to the serious problems which will be confronting the City of Hope in the coming years. The harsh reality is that the health system in the nation is being shaken to its very foundations.

As a result of new regulations which are imposing financial drains, hospitals are retreating from proper concern for the ill. Admissions are being denied to many patients. Bed stays are being shortened despite continued need. Services are being reduced or eliminated. The quality of care is threatened.

The City of Hope is more vulnerable than other hospitals to the cutbacks in reimbursements by government agencies and insurance companies.

A substantial number of our patients are not covered by any insurance.

No personal charge is made to patients who do have insurance.

Our Medical Center treats only victims of major diseases, which involve expensive procedures. It costs us more than $1,000 a day to treat one patient.

While other hospitals have a declining patient census, ours has been steadily growing.

As a unique research oriented institution—that of being a pilot center—we also are affected by the large cutbacks in grants pursued by the government.

Nevertheless, we have adamantly refused to depart from our high standards of care of impede our research endeavors.

The contents of my Keynote Address, and what you will see and hear in the days and nights to follow, seek to inform and inspire you. More signficantly, our objective is to move you to extraordinary efforts: first, to assure the integrity of our livesaving programs and second, to alert the citizens of your communities to resist the downgrading of their health systems.

With these introductory comments as a backdrop, I present my report.

OUR PATIENT SERVICES

The free, personalized quality care at the City of Hope attracted the highest number of patients in our history. In our role as a think tank for hospitals, advanced healthgiving therapies were offered to all our patients.

Some highlights are: improved diagnostic and treatment procedures for many cancer conditions, including non-surgical approaches and faster post-surgical recovery; new methods bringing even higher survival rates in our Bone Marrow Transplantation Program; new chemotherapy agents and innovative ways of administering them; new techniques to cope with congenital and genetic abnormalities; new systems for delivery of oxygen to patients with lung diseases; new surgical methods for cancer of the brain, spine and nervous system; and new implanted medication pumps to help liver cancer patients.

A complete listing would go on and on.

OUR CONSULTATION SERVICES

Second opinions from our professional staff have been provided for thousands of patients, under the care of private physicians and medical institutions, from virtually every state and many countries overseas.

OUR RESEARCH PROGRAMS

The U.S. National Cancer Institute renewed the designation of the City of Hope as a Clinical Cancer Research Center for the next five years. This is given only to selected institutions, and is highly prestigious.

We receive between $10 and $12 million in research grants and this is implemented by our own funds. More than 100 scientists are involved in 80 cancer research projects. Hundreds of findings and discoveries come from our laboratories every year.

As you know, our eminence in genetic engineering was attained several years ago by synthesizing human insulin. New discoveries from our laboratories in this field which have received world-wide attention were: a substance called tissue plasminogen activator (TPA) which assists the body in dissolving blood clots and helps avoid some of the consequences of heart attacks; the isolation and mass production of the tumor necrosis factor (TNF) which kills cancerous growth; and the invention of probes to identify many hereditary diseases from the DNA itself.

It is the conviction of scientists at the City of Hope that the current "knowledge explosion" will eliminate most of the diseases known today within the next 50 years. What a magnificent heritage we will be giving to future generations!

OUR AUXILIARY MOVEMENT

We now have 520 affiliates in 210 cities and 30 states. Their membership and fundraising are at an all-time high.

Fifty-eight of them were organized since the last Convention in 1983. They encompassed the recruitment of young adults, industry leaders, and senior citizens.

Our tens of thousands of auxiliary members have gained an outstanding reputation for their devotion and diligence to our cause. This is understandable. There is a gladness of the heart which comes to us who are associated with the city of Hope. Our activities lift the spirits, enhance a sense of self-worth, and increase our capabilities.

OUR FINANCIAL CRISIS

For the fiscal year ending September, 1984, our income was $87,000,000. For the fiscal year ending September, 1985, it should reach $92,000,000.

These figures sound good, but they are offset by several factors. Income projected for the Medical Center declined by almost $2 million. Expenses projected for the Medical Center rose by more than $2 million. Cutbacks in grants are beginning to take effect.

We have been compelled to borrow $10 million to met immediate cash flow requirements.

We also have to take into account that, on October 1st, we must provide for an inflationary increase of four percent in our budget for the new fiscal year, when we will be spending almost $2 million a week.

To meet these problems, the Board of directors launched an Emergency Fund Campaign for $10 million. It is calling upon our members and supporters for gifts, over and above those given previously. These extra dollars will determine: how many patients will be accepted by our Medical Center; how many patients will be turned away; and how extensive our basic and clinical research programs will be.

In a real sense, we are deciding who shall live and who shall die! This is an awesome responsibility, but we are confident that the response will be swift and effective.

OUR LEADERSHIP

The City of Hope is composed of dedicated and talented members. Its leaders must, therefore, undertake burdensome duties and demonstrate special qualities which command the respect and bring forth the best efforts of those they lead.

Our heartfelt thanks for a job well done go to, President Abraham S. Bolsky, the National Board of Directors, past Presidents Mike Hersch, Mannie Fineman, Percy Solotoy, and the late Louis Tabak. Associate Executive Director Sanford Shapero, Executive Medical Director Charles Mittman, and Medical Administrator Thomas Galinski, the officers of all our auxiliaries, our auxiliary members who assume leadership in their communities.

FACING THE FUTURE

The quantity and quality of health care and medical research is everybody's "business". Diseases do not pick and choose their victims. They strike at the strong and the weak, the good and the bad, the rich and the poor, the old and the young. We are all "under the gun", to use the vernacular.

Without question, great progress has been made against these age-old enemies of humankind. The latest government figures indicate that one of every two persons stricken with cancer will survive. Some fourteen other diseases show similar encouraging data. These advances were particularly made possible by government funding over the years.

Sad to relate, the clock has been turned back in both patient care and research. Predictions are that the worst is yet to come . . . unless public consciousness can be aroused against it.

Whatever the outcome of these developments, the City of Hope must continue to be a leading force in the health field. Our theme for this Convention is "Miracles Through Medicine". This was adopted because of our awareness that the City of Hope and medical science in general are on the threshold of spectacular breakthroughs.

The members of the City of Hope have the vision, faith and courage to overcome all obstacles. These attributes make them "miracle workers".

We are being challenged to mobilize the maximum human and material resources to go forward in our mission . . . that of relieving pain, prolonging life, effecting cures and wiping diseases from our midst.

Let us carry on in the spirit expressed by Louis Pasteur, "The future belongs to those who have done the most for suffering humanity". That future belongs to the family of the City of Hope. That future will belong to the people of America.

CBS TO AIR MISSING CHILDREN PICTURES

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, the tragedy of missing and exploited children continues to plague our Nation. As many as 1.5 million children are reported missing each year. As chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee Subcommittee on Juvenile Justice, and cochairman of the Senate's Children's Caucus, I have spent considerable time studying this horrible problem and working to solve it.

I am heartened to bring to the Senate's attention today a letter I have received from Mr. Gene F. Jankowski, president of the CBS Broadcast Group. In response to a May 20 letter from Senator HEINZ and me, in which 83 other Senators joined, Mr. Jankowski has advised me that CBS, beginning this fall, will air on a regular basis the pictures and descriptions of missing children. As Mr. Jankowski notes, CBS' commitment to devote prime time to this worthy cause will ensure that this crucial information reaches CBS' largest and most diverse audiences.

I heartily congratulate CBS on its commitment, and applaud its willingness to serve the public in this manner. The media, because of its ability to reach all Americans, is central to the efforts to find missing children. In the past, when pictures and descriptions of missing children have been aired on network television, many of those children have been recognized and returned safely to their homes. CBS' commitment can only increase the frequency of these reunions.

When President Reagan signed into law the Missing Children's Assistance Act, which I introduced in the 98th Congress, we took a great step forward in the fight against this national tragedy. Voluntary private sector initiatives like the one now undertaken by CBS are an essential compliment to the programs established by the act.

Mr. President, I again commend CBS, and ask that Mr. Jankowski's letter of July 3 be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CBS,
New York, NY, July 3, 1985.

Senators SPECTER and HEINZ,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATORS SPECTER and HEINZ: On May 20, 1985 you and 78 of your colleagues in the Senate wrote to Mr. Thomas Wyman urging CBS to air on a regular basis the pictures and descriptions of missing children.

I am pleased to advise you that beginning this fall we will be able to do so. This will be one part of a new CBS plan for broadcasting additional public service announcements ("PSA") in prime time.

This effort is incremental to an already extensive commitment. In 1984 alone, that effort represented $195 million worth of air time. By adding to the prime time component we will ensure additional exposure to our largest and most diverse audiences.

The announcements about missing children will be prepared in cooperation with the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. The tragedy of missing and exploited children is of grave concern to all of us. We hope that CBS's effort will assist significantly in the growing nationwide response to this problem.

Sincerely,

GENE JANKOWSKI.

FELLOW ALABAMIAN NAMED PRESIDENT OF PRIVATE CARRIER CONFERENCE

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to announce that a constituent, Mr. Herman Granberry, director of Transportation for West Point-Pepperell, has been elected president of the Private Carrier Conference of the American Trucking Association [ATA].

The private carrier conference, the largest of 11 conferences affiliated with the ATA, represents manufacturers, distributors, shippers and receivers who operate trucks as an extension of their primary business endeavors. Private carriers are the dominant sector of the trucking industry today, hauling nearly 60 percent of the Nation's intercity truck ton mileage and operating 6 million vehicles.

A 21-year veteran with West Point-Pepperell, Mr. Granberry holds a dozen patents for innovations and advancements within the textile industry. He brings to his new position of leadership with the private carrier conference a wealth of knowledge and experience. I am confident that he will make an effective contribution toward the Nation's search for a responsible transportation policy in the months and year ahead.

I know that my colleagues join me in congratulating Mr. Granberry as he begins his new responsibilities.

Thank you, Mr. President.

VETERANS HEALTH

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I rise today to speak on an issue that is very important to all of us—veterans health. As a Vietnam veteran who spent time in a military hospital overseas, I am very concerned with the current state of affairs in this area and would like to again bring it to the attention of my colleagues.

The situation facing the Veterans' Administration health care system today is critical. We face an expanded demand for medical services as a result of the aging World War II and Korean veteran population. Steps must be taken now if we are to meet the future health needs of these and other veterans.

My home State of South Dakota has approximately 79,000 veterans—12,700 of whom are over the age of 65. By 1990 this figure will rise to 18,700. By the year 2000 the total will have jumped to more than 24,000. Their medical needs are met by VA hospitals in Sioux Falls, Hot Springs, and Fort Meade. Nationally, the number of veterans over 65 is expected to triple from the current 3 million to 9 million over the next two decades. The VA reports that it currently turns away 20,000 eligible patients a month.

By 1995, 60 percent of all elderly males in the United States will have served in the military. Currently, 4 of every 10 Americans are veterans or members of their immediate families. Clearly, VA issues are important to many people.

For fiscal year 1985 the Federal Government has budgeted nearly $26 billion for veterans programs. Over the years, South Dakota has received a steady increase in VA funds in order to keep pace with rising medical costs. Nationally, the VA has been granted significant funding increases in recent years and the current fiscal year budget is the highest ever. Still, more must be done.

As we have debated the fiscal year 1986 budget, veterans health care and the level of funding needed has been a prominent issue. Of course, the deficit has made everyone budget conscious; but the fact remains that a potentially serious problem must be addressed. A number of questions must be asked: Will VA funding allocations for South Dakota and other States be sufficient to continue VA programs at their current level of service? How do we best maintain the present system? What steps must we take to meet the increased patient load to which I have referred? What changes must be made in the VA health care delivery system? To answer these questions satisfactorily, every option must be considered.

According to a 1983 survey conducted by the VA, approximately 380,000 veterans will require nursing home care by 1990. Also, the VA will need a minimum of 134,000 hospital beds by the year 2000—an increase of 68 percent. This demand will decrease once the needs of the World War II and Korean veterans have been served—probably between the years of 2010 and 2020.

The U.S. General Accounting Office [GAO] reports that the VA has not adequately explored the availability of community-based health services. I have often said that, properly undertaken, this option could help overcome VA overcrowding, as well as offer the individual veteran more convenient services. Both the Senate and House Veterans' Affairs Committees are considering legislation to determine to what extent the private sector can be of assistance to the VA in meeting long-term health care demands.

I have cosponsored S. 1007, most of which was adopted as part of the fiscal year 1986 veterans health bill. S. 1007 calls on the VA to pursue several approaches which are aimed at more efficiently expanding VA medical and nursing home facilities. It requires the VA, when developing new or replacement facilities, to first consider leasing or purchasing existing private facilities. Also, because VA facilities are generally more expensive to build and operate, a pilot program would be established to analyze the cost and number of different VA/private sector intiatives.

Mr. President, S. 1007 is but one example of the type of legislation that must be pursued if we are to meet the needs of our veterans. The time is now. Innovative and constructive approaches must be taken. Federal involvement must remain as the foundation for an effective system, but there is room for more private, local, and State participation in meeting veterans' health care needs.

THE NATIONAL BAR ASSOCIATION'S NEW PRESIDENT

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, on Friday night, July 26, 1985, in Chicago, IL, Fred D. Gray was sworn in as the forty-third (43d) president of the National Bar Association. Justice Oscar Adams, the first black elected to the Alabama Supreme Court, administered the oath of office to him (and subsequently to the remaining elected officers of the National Bar Association).

Mr. President, the National Bar Association was founded in 1925, and is the oldest minority bar association in America. Over the past 60 years it has flourished tremendously in size and influence. Its network of over 8,500 lawyers judges, law faculty and administrators, and law students, has made significant strides. However, Mr. Gray is the first Alabamian to head this prestigious organization.

Mr. Gray received his B.S. degree from Alabama State University, his law degree from Case Western Reserve University. He is a member of the Alabama, Ohio, American Bar Association, the National Association of Criminal Defense Attorneys, the Association of Trial Lawyers of America, the Alabama Trial Lawyers Association, and the American Judicature Society. He is a past president of both the Macon County, AL, Bar Association and the Alabama Lawyers Association.

He is a senior partner in an outstanding law firm, Gray, Langford, Sapp, Davis & McGowan, in Montgomery and Tuskegee. He has won numerous awards of merit and distinction from various groups, including the Alabama State University Alumni Association, the Civil Liberties Union of Alabama, the NAACP, the National Bar Association, and the Educational Board of Community Leaders of America.

He is admitted to practice in all courts, not only the 11th circuit, but also in the sixth circuit. By his informal account, he has tried more than 275 cases to verdicts.

He has a very broad practice. I doubt if there is a law student in recent years who has not read Gomillion versus Lightfoot in courses on constitutional law. This landmark case opened the door for redistricting and the reapportionment of various legislative bodies, and laid the groundwork for the Supreme Court's later one-man, one-vote decision. This was Fred Gray's case, as were other landmark cases dealing with the systematic exclusion of blacks from jury services or ordinances requiring segregation intrastate in violation of the 14th amendment and due process in student disciplinary proceedings.

Of course, Fred Gray had a little help. In three of these cases he tried and argued on appeal, he was associated with Thurgood Marshall. But there are few attorneys whose trial and appellate records can match Fred Gray's legacy of landmark decisions.

I have known Fred Gray for approximately 25 years. When I went on the bench in 1971, there were two black lawyers in Alabama who were universally acclaimed to have reputations of excellence among the enlightened bar of Alabama. These were a great lawyer in Birmingham who is now in his late seventies, Arthur Shores, and Fred Gray. He practiced before me while I was on the bench. He always did an outstanding job. I know that he will do an excellent job as the 43rd president of the National Bar Association.

Mr. President, I offer to Mr. Gray my congratulations and my pledge to assist him in any way that I properly can during his term of office.

SALLY A. KELLY—A MASSACHUSETTS LAWYER WHO MAKES A DIFFERENCE

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, one of the most impressive victories in the recent term of the U.S. Supreme Court was won by Sally A. Kelly, administrative counsel in the office of Attorney General Francis X. Bellotti of Massachusetts in the case of Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. versus Massachusetts.

On June 3, 1985, in her first case before the Court, which she described as a "textbook example of federalism," Ms. Kelly won a unanimous decision that ERISA, the Federal pension statute, did not preempt State laws on the subject and that insurance companies could properly be required to provide coverage for mental health care, as mandated by a Massachusetts statute.

As a specialist in health law, Sally Kelly has been active on many fronts in upholding the right of citizens to decent health care, including authorship of the patient-abuse law in Massachusetts. She has also shown her commitment to the public interest through her tireless efforts on behalf of nonprofit groups in Boston, such as the Boston Food Bank and the Fellsway Inn.

Sally Kelly's remarkable contributions and her dedication to public service are recognized in the current issue of Business Week. It is a pleasure to share her achievements with my colleagues in the Senate, and I ask unanimous consent that the article in Business Week, "A Lawyer Who Wanted To Make a Difference" may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Business Week, Aug. 5, 1985]

A LAWYER WHO "WANTED TO MAKE A DIFFERENCE"

Sally A. Kelly, administrative counsel to Massachusetts Attorney General Francis X. Bellotti and aspiring gourmet, cherishes her cooking lessons with Odette, the well-known Boston chef. But her fellow attorneys could take a lesson from Kelly, who recently persuaded the U.S. Supreme Court to endorse the rights of states to regulate insurance benefits. The 33-year-old Kelly won a unanimous decision in her first case before the court.

Kelly took on the insurance industry in 1979 when a Wellesley (Mass.) man complained that his insurer, Travelers Corp., would not pay for his daughter's mental-health treatment as mandated by state law. Travelers argued that the 1973 state law, which required insurance companies to provide at least $500 in mental-health coverage, was preempted by the federal Employee Retirement Income Security Act. But Kelly successfully demonstrated that mental-health coverage was similar to state-regulated car and neonatal insurance. "This is a textbook example of federalism," she declares.

Kelly's specialty in health law also led her to bring the first suit against a Massachusetts nursing home for patient abuse, in 1977. She later helped to write the state's patient-abuse law. Kelly is active in Bellotti's task force on rights of the elderly and in Massachusetts' role as lead counsel for 40 states looking for a remedy for investors who lost money in Baldwin-United Corp. annuities. Kelly also assisted Bellotti when he was president of the National Association of Attorneys General, which works to promote states' rights.

As if that weren't enough, she serves on the boards of several nonprofit groups, including the Boston Food Bank, which distributes food to local shelters, and Fellsway Inn, a halfway house for alcoholic women. "I always wanted to make a difference," says Kelly. "My heroes were Robert Kennedy and Dorothy Day."

PRAISING TALENT SEARCH

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, I would like to comment the Department of Education for a program it has administered for over 10 years entitled Talent Search. This program is especially important to West Virginia—almost half of our counties have been aided by Talent Search. In my State where unemployment is very high, the education of young people is critical to improving economic conditions.

Talent Search's primary goal is to motivate young people with special problems or needs to seek higher education and to ensure them true access to a quality education. The program identifies youth with financial or cultural needs who possess exceptional potential, and then helps them with training, financial aid, and other services. Talent Search staff provide career and academic counseling, tutorial services, assistance with application forms, publicity and counseling of financial aid opportunities, and a followup service to all Talent Search participants.

Grants are awarded to colleges and universities, public and private agencies and organizations, and in exceptional cases, to secondary schools. Through this program, youth are encouraged to continue in and graduate from secondary schools and to enroll in and complete postsecondary educational programs.

Young people within the ages of 12 years and 17 years are aided by Talent Search. The target student population consists of high school students and high school and college dropouts. The program focuses attention toward low-income families where neither of the participant's parents have received a bachelor's degree. Veterans are also given special consideration.

In my own home State of West Virginia, 27 of 55 counties have been targeted for aid through Talent Search. The Talent Search Program, combined with many other educational programs within the State, has made a significant contribution is reducing West Virginia's high school dropout rate. It also has helped to strengthen college placement efforts throughout the State. Students in need of financial aid have been helped immensely in the application process and in learning of the aid that can enable them to gain the education they desire and deserve.

Ensuring access to higher education for these young people is extremely important to every State. In West Virginia, the effort to achieve this goal has been tremendously aided by the Talent Search Program. Again, I commend my colleagues and the Department of Education for their role in sustaining this valuable program. Through the education of our youth, all of society will prosper.

EQUAL CREDIT OPPORTUNITY ACT

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, the Equal Credit Opportunity Act was passed in 1977 in order to prohibit discrimination in credit transactions on the basis of race, sex, marital status and age. It was passed in recognition of the fact that race, sex, marital status or age are not and should not be part of a determination of creditworthiness. Employment should be considered. Credit history should be considered. Sex or marital status should not. Neither has any relevance to the question of ability to repay a loan.

Included in the Equal Credit Opportunity Act was a provision authorizing the Federal Reserve to exempt nonconsumer transactions from the law wherever the Federal Reserve determined that application of the law would not contribute substantially to achieving the purposes of the act. Pursuant to this authority, the Federal Reserve Board, in 1977, issued regulations exempting commercial credit transactions from important requirements of the Equal Credit Opportunity Act. Since that time, commercial transactions have been exempt from the ban on inquiries regarding the loan applicants' marital status, certain recordkeeping requirements, and the requirement that denials of credit be accompanied by written explanations of that denial.

The exemptions approved by the Federal Reserve Board are far more sweeping than Congress ever intended. In fact, the exemptions approved by the Federal Reserve reduce the Equal Credit Opportunity Act to an absurdity. Women must be ensured an equal opportunity to go into business and obtain the same financial assistance to do so as men.

I am proud to be an original cosponsor of the 1985 amendments to the Equal Credit Opportunity Act introduced by Senator DOLE on July 23. This legislation limits the authority the Federal Reserve in promulgating regulations pursuant to the Equal Credit Opportunity Act to ensure that the rights of women and minorities are protected, as Congress intended them to be.

The bill specifies that no regulation may exempt personal, family, household or business loans from the requirements of the Equal Credit Opportunity Act. It further requires that any exemption that is granted by the Federal Reserve must be reviewed every 2 years and a determination made that the exemption remains appropriate.

This bill will correct an injustice that Congress thought it had corrected long ago. It will allow talented women who wish to enter the business world or expand their existing business to do so, and a bank may not require her husband's signature on the loan.

It will ensure that women or minorities who are turned down for loans are turned down for legitimate reasons, because a written explanation of that rejection will be issued.

It will also give women and minorities recourse in the courts if a lender consistently discriminates because records will exist that can be used as evidence to show discrimination.

The 1985 amendments to the Equal Credit Opportunity Act ensure fairness in the allocation of credit. It ensures that the equality we legislated in 1977 exists today. I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this important legislation.

PROBLEMS FACING DAIRY FARMERS

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, on Monday, July 29, 1985, I met with about 50 Pennsylvania dairy farmers from northeastern Pennsylvania, at the Carl Pensak dairy farm in Factoryville. These farmers, who are affiliated primarily with the Northern Tier Farmers Union Milk Producers Association, the Pennsylvania Farmers Union, ahd the Pennsylvania State Grange, expressed grave concerns about the State of the dairy industry in Pennsylvania and in the United States today. I would like to take this opportunity to share their views with the Senate, especially in light of the Senate's interest in the Farm bill and agricultural matters at this time.

The farmers with whom I met had two issues uppermost in their minds. The first of these concerned the importation of casein. Casein is a dry protein milk derivative used in dairy and dairy-substitute products, plastics, paint, and more. Imported chiefly from New Zealand, Australia, and the European Community countries, some 87,000 metric tons of casein was imported into the United States in 1984, according to the U.S. Foreign Agriculture Service. This represents, Mr. President, a startling jump from the 58,000 metric tons that the FAS reports were shipped to the United States in 1981. Other sources have placed the amount of casein brought into the country at even higher levels.

What is especially disconcerting about this situation is that at least some of the casein reaching our shores is being subsidized by foreign governments. As a result, dairy products from Pennsylvania and elsewhere in the United States reportedly are being displaced. The farmers with whom I talked expressed their strong view that import restrictions on casein should be imposed with the passage of the 1985 farm bill. It is my sense that this approach merits very strong consideration in this body, at an early time.

The other matter of special concern to the dairymen was the current dairy support program and, specifically, the dairy support price. One spokesman for the group noted that the current support price of $11.60 per hundredweight is the lowest in 6 years. In his view, and the view of others with whom I met, this is completely inadequate. It was suggested that, for dairy farmers to maintain a level of income that would keep them even with the national economy, support prices would have to be increased to $16 per hundredweight.

What is clear, Mr. President, is that our current dairy program is not meeting the needs of our Nation's dairy farmers. In 1983, the President enacted legislation that began a Dairy Diversion Program paying farmers $10 per hundredweight to reduce their marketings by 5 to 30 percent below their established production base. But my conversations showed that only a small number of farmers ever took advantage of this program. The price of milk has remained low. Dairy farmers throughout Pennsylvania are experiencing exceptional economic pressures at this time.

It may be necessary to deal with these issues on a regional basis because the problems for California, for example, are very different from those of Pennsylvania.

In the coming days the Senate will be contemplating reform of the current Dairy Program. It is imperative that we move quickly and firmly to deal with this problem at that time. We simply cannot afford to drive our farmers into perpetual hock with unrealistic and ineffective policies. I urge my colleagues to give this matter the most serious consideration when it is brought to the floor.

On a final note, I would like to briefly mention two other issues brought before me during my meeting. The first goes hand in hand with what I have been discussing. I refer specifically to the problem of farm loans. Without getting into extensive detail on this issue, I would like simply to emphasize my view that the criteria and guidelines for granting loans from the Farmers Home Administration must be reviewed thoroughly and addressed vigorously by this body in the upcoming farm legislation.

The last issue regards the Federal Government's Surplus Food Distribution Program. During the course of my meeting I was accompanied by Wyoming County Commissioners Robert Barziloski, Richard Fitzsimmons, and Harold Grow. Commissioner Barziloski, responsible for the Surplus Food Distribution Program in the county, expressed fear that the program might end this year. "There is no sense in having a hungry America," he said, "while there is a big food surplus in the country."

It is my strong sense that the Government's distribution will not end this year, but that is not the principal reason why I chose to mention this concern here. Rather, it is because I believe this remark has much greater implications. Simply put, we absolutely must rectify the problems that currently beset our agricultural community if we hope to have a strong and healthy economy and a strong and healthy Nation. Agriculture is the backbone of America, and, without the attention it deserves, we may all face a hungry America in the future.

JACK BARRY

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, the best-known personality, and the best-known voice, in Vermont does not reflect a public official. Instead, it is my good friend Jack Barry.

Virtually any time anyone discusses issues in Vermont—and we Vermonters discuss issues more than most people—the discussion usually turns to what Jack Barry has said on the subject.

I would like to share with my colleagues in the Senate an interesting article about Jack that appeared in the Vermont Vanguard Press, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

[From the Vanguard Press, June 23-30, 1985]

INSIDE TRACK

(By Peter Freyne)

Jumpin' Jack Flash—This is a test. For the next three weeks no matter where you tune your AM receiver, you will not be able to pick up the mellifluous tones of Vermont's Mr. Radio—the one and only Jack Barry. Crisis intervention clinics will no doubt add extra staff and police patrols will be beefed up to handle any Barry fans exhibiting withdrawal symptoms.

After two and a half years on Burlington's WDOT, Jack says he's cut a deal with Peter Gibbert, owner of the Plattsburgh-based KDR, that will keep him in filet mignon until he retires. The Jack Barry Show will be produced out of new digs adjacent to the Mill Restaurant in Winooski and run in the same time slot it has had for years: 9-11 a.m.

Jack says phone calls will go to the New York studio first and then be rerouted to Winooski. Vermont callers will be able to dial a local number to get through to the voice that never quits.

For Jack, it's yet another radio station to add to his very impressive resumé. And it will be his first shot at taking on two separate audiences at once. That eight-mile wide puddle we call Lake Champlain may as well be a million miles wide in the minds of most local media. WPTZ-TV is just about the only operation to seriously attempt to cover both sides of the lake. And as their Burlington-based sales staff will tell you, it pays off.

Thirty years ago Jack Barry was an eyewitness to the birth of the radio call-in show. Working for a radio station in Wilmington, Delaware, the Waterbury Center native got a firsthand look at the legendary Joe Pyne in action. The brash and often insulting Mr. Pyne is credited by most observers with inventing the genre.

In 1954 Jack Barry came home to Vermont and started his first call-in talk show on the then brand-new WDOT. "It's Your Nickel" he called it. Over the years he's worked for the other major AM stations in town as well.

Many of Jack's Vermont listeners wish he'd be a little more brusque himself sometimes, and tell some of the windbags that call him up everyday to suck on glue. But Jack's a gentleman. And when the day comes that Vermont's only genuine media star hangs up his microphone, thousands of Vermonters will be missing a good friend. Until then let's enjoy him while we've still got him.

PARTY REFORM AND FEDERAL ELECTION LAWS

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, today I introduced the Integrity in Lobbying Act of 1985, a bill intended to improve our current ineffective and burdensome system of lobby registration. By establishing a system of more timely and complete disclosure, by fostering higher standards of professional ethics and responsibility among lobbyists, and by reducing unnecessary burdens on the first amendment rights of all Americans, this legislation can help generate greater public confidence in our legislative process.

As significant as this legislation is, it addresses only one portion of the problems currently confronting our representative system of government. On a broader level, if we are to deal responsibly with the difficult issues confronting Congress today, we must reform our entire electoral process in ways that place the collective interests of society above the growing multitude of narrow, special interest claimants. For however worthy each individual cause may be, this Nation can no longer afford a political process that separates complex problems into tiny fragments, blindly hoping that the cumulative outcome will somehow total the general public interest.

Mr. President, our electoral system historically has relied upon our political parties to perform this important representative function of combining disparate interests into broad coalitions, each representing a distinct public philosophy about the proper role of Government in society. Our political parties have never been rigid and disciplined collections of single-minded ideologues—they allowed ample room for expressing individual interests and opinions. But the parties were by far the most important organizations in our electoral system, providing a framework of shared ideals within which different points of view could be debated. And because our parties were decentralized, they provided avenues for representing regional and local values within the Federal Government as well as social and economic concerns.

In recent years, the broadly based system of representation provided by the parties has been eroded. Though still important, the parties' role in Government and elections has been diminished by the rise of new forms of campaign finance, heightened reliance on narrow interest organizations, and new modes of political communication. According to research conducted by the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations:

America's political system has changed substantially since 1960. Patterns of politics based upon lasting commitments to party and place—community, State, and region—have eroded significantly. They are being replaced an increasingly national political marketplace in which competing candidates, interest groups, and parties vie for media attention and rely upon modern marketing techniques to win support from an ever more volatile and skeptical public. The past 25 years have witnessed the final witheringaway of once powerful political machines; the development of a new process for nominating Presidents, characterized by the proliferation and heightened influence of Presidential primaries and by the declining role of State and local party leaders at national conventions; and the rise of television as possibly the most important single force in modern politics. As strong party loyalities have waned, the role of independent politicians, voters, and issue-oriented activists has expanded in contemporary elections. There has been an explosion of organized interest groups, single issue politics, and new group-related sources of campaign finance.

These are important and in some respects disturbing trends, with important implications for how Congress operates, for the messages we hear, and for the kinds of laws we enact. Most disturbing of all is evidence that Federal election laws have contributed to party decline, limiting party involvement in elections while favoring other forms of political activity. Thus, in 1972, 2 years before Congress established the current system of campaign contribution and expenditure limits, political parties provided approximately 17 percent of the contributions to candidates for the House of Representatives. Just 10 years after the landmark amendments to FECA in 1974, and despite historic fundraising efforts by both political parties, political party contributions to House candidates had fallen to less than 3 percent of total contributions, and the situation in the Senate was even worse.

Part of this decline was caused by the unrealistically low limits which FECA placed on party contributions to congressional candidates—limits which have not been raised since they were first passed in 1974. Moreover, as the accompanying article on "State Parties and the National Law of Campaign Finance" makes clear, State and local political parties have been particularly constrained by Federal election laws.

During the same period that the party role in campaign finance has been declining, the number of nonparty political action committees increased from 608 to 3,525, and the value of PAC contributions to congressional campaigns increased from $11.2 million in 1974—16 percent of total contributions—to $102 million in 1984—29 percent of all contributions. This does not mean, as we so often hear, that PAC's are corrupting our electoral system or brazenly undermining the integrity of the legislative process. So long as we require adequate disclosure—which we do—PAC's are a legitimate and constitutionally protected form of public involvement in the political arena. The problem with PAC's and other expressions of the current interest group explosion is that they encourage citizens and Congress alike to deal with complex issues on a parochial, ad hoc basis. They encourage us to look at every problem in simple terms of "what's in it for me, right here, right now." They make it easy to avoid, if only temporarily, the tough but unavoidable decisions we all must make to reconcile our competing goals with the resources available and to consider how our individual interests fit within a framework of the broader interests of society at large.

In such decisions, the parties play an irreplaceable role. They begin the process of building coalitions, of identifying areas of consensus, of focusing attention on priorities. Far from limiting the role of parties in our electoral process, as we have done in recent years, we should be raising and removing limitations on party contributions in campaigns.

I want to emphasize that this is not a matter of partisan advantage or debate. Although many Democrats believe they have some catching up to do in terms of fundraising, leaders of both parties are in agreement on the basic goal of easing limitations on effective party competition. As former DNC director Eugene Eidenberg expressed it:

The political process should be regulated by government only to the degree necessary to insure the integrity and legitimacy of its results. I support the principle of political parties being free to make unlimited expenditures in behalf of their candidates.

Or, in the words of RNC Chairman Frank Fahrenkopf:

There is a legal limit on what each party can contribute to its candidates. As the cost of campaigns continue to grow, the percentage of funding from non-party sources must and will continue to grow. If the concern is really on the amount of money going to candidates from PAC's, a simple logical solution is readily apparent. There should be no limit on the amount political parties can spend or contribute to candidates for public office.

Ultimately, I support removing entirely the current limits on political party contributions to political campaigns. So long as we retain full and timely disclosure of party contributions and receipts, the public interest is protected. In the interim, we should at least raise the current party contribution limits for House and Senate candidates. Party contribution ceilings might be raised to 50 percent of funds received from other sources, and expenditures by parties on behalf of Senate candidates might be raised to 5 cents per voter from the current 2 cents. Limitations imposed by Federal laws on State and local parties should be eliminated entirely.

The important point is that enhancing the electoral roles of our political parties provides the surest way of improving communications between citizens and their elected officials, of promoting greater public confidence in our electoral system, and of protecting the performance and integrity of the legislative process.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following articles entitled "Federalism and American Politics: New Relationships, a Changing System," Intergovernmental Aspects of FECA: State Parties and Campaign Finance,' and "View From the Commission" be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERALISM AND AMERICAN POLITICS: NEW RELATIONSHIPS, A CHANGING SYSTEM

(Timothy J. Conlan)

America's political system has changed substantially since 1960. Patterns of politics based upon lasting commitments to party and place—community, state, and region—have eroded significantly. They are being replaced by an increasingly national political marketplace in which competing candidates, interest groups, and parties vie for media attention and rely upon modern marketing techniques to win support from an ever more volatile and skeptical public. Specifically, the past 25 years have witnessed the final withering-away of once powerful political "machines"; the development of a new process for nominating presidents, characterized by the proliferation and heightened influence of presidential primaries and by the declining role of state and local party leaders at national conventions; and the rise of television as possibly the most important single force in modern politics. As strong party loyalties have waned, the role of independent politicians, voters, and issue-oriented activists has expanded in contemporary elections. There has been an explosion of organized interest groups, "single-issue" politics, and new group-related sources of campaign finance.

The party system has been at the center of many of these changes. Some believe the parties are trapped in a permanent pattern of decline. Others see parties adapting creatively to their new and complex political environment or undergoing a new phase of realignment. Normative assessments of these changes also vary widely. Some applaud what they perceive as greater openness, responsiveness, and heightened issue consciousness in contemporary politics. Others lament what appears to be growing volatility and fragmentation in a political system more reliant on the media and interest groups. To the extent that parties are indeed losing relative influence, however, individuals sharing both perspectives have raised concerns about the long-term exercise of effective representative government. Scholars in particular have come to view political parties as an indispensable link between elected leaders and the general public in a democratic society. According to the nonpartisan Committee for Party Renewal:

Strong parties and a strong party system remain the best hope for representative and responsible democracy in an extended and diverse republic like ours. They are the only institutions in our electoral system that can be held accountable for what government does. Those elected to public office in their name must make policy, not just advocate it, and are answerable for their actions to the electorate as a whole, not to a narrow constituency of limited and special interest.[1]

Because of their obvious importance, these changes have been much studied and debated. Almost overlooked, however, have been the implications of these political developments for the conduct and institutions of intergovernmental relations. In particular, federalism and the political party system appear to intersect in three significant ways:

Historically, the highly decentralized structure of American political parties provided an important avenue of state and local influence and communication in Washington and helped maintain political balance among the different levels of government. In recent years, changes in the parties' roles in the political system appear to have upset some of these traditional relationships, especially where traditional party functions have been assumed by competing political institutions with predominantly national orientations.

Footnotes at end of article.

Both the processes and outcomes of intergovernmental policy making appear to have been affected by such political changes. Organizations representing the clients and providers of new intergovernmental programs have contributed to the proliferation of Washington-based interest groups and encouraged the expansion of national lobbying offices representing state and local governments. It may be no coincidence that one of the most prolific periods of federal growth and activism corresponded with an era marked by rapid political evolution and declining state and local party influence in Washington.

Finally, the extent to which contemporary politics has altered roles and relationships within the federal system may have important implications for the basic values federalism was established to promote integrating diverse community values within the framework of broadly shared national perspectives; providing multiple arenas of meaningful public expression and participation; promoting policy experimentation and programmatic diversity; maintaining an effective system of shared and separated powers; and promoting more effective and responsive government by avoiding unworkable concentrations of governmental responsibility. Although it may be possible to pursue such values through other instruments of government or to concentrate on other possibly competing values, these objectives represent the stakes involved in the interplay of politics and federalism.

This article explores how these intergovernmental issues has been affected by political changes in America. Drawing upon the Commission's ongoing study of Transformations in American Politics and Their Implications for Federalism, it analyzes, first, changes in contemporary political processes that have had significant consequences for federal, state, and local roles in our political system. Traditional party roles in maintaining federalism, challenges to those roles by competing institutions, and emerging party adaptations to such challenges are discussed. The potential policy implications of these changes are then examined, followed by an exploration of their long term consequences for fundamental federal values.

PARTIES AND POLITICAL BALANCE IN THE FEDERAL SYSTEM

Because the United States has never had ideologically coherent, mass membership parties on the European model, political scientists are accustomed to thinking of American parties as relatively weak and loosely organized bodies. Yet, the party system traditionally has been the single most important political institution in American politics. The parties provided access to the governmental system for much of the electorate and served as an arbiter for prevailing values in individual communities.

This central role was most clearly manifested by the large urban machines, but it was not limited to them. In the late nineteenth century, political parties mobilized the electorate so fully and effectively that they were compared to "armies drawn up for combat."[2] At that time, parties dominated the popular press, controlled large numbers of government positions, and—through parades, clubs, and gatherings—provided a major source of popular entertainment. More important, until the mid twentieth century, American parties retained a paramount role in the most basic electoral functions of representative democracy: recruiting and nominating candidates for office, structuring debate on public issues, organizing and mobilizing the electorate, financing politics, and informing citizens about candidates and government policies. Consequently, it is not surprising that some of the earliest research in political behavior underscored the influence of parties at both ends of the representational process: a citizen's identification with one political party or the other was found to be the single most important factor in predicting how that individual would vote,[3] while in Washington a representative's party affiliation was found to be the best indicator of what his or her position would be on the majority of roll call votes.[4]

PARTY DECENTRALIZATION

Equally significant, the structure of traditional American parties was intimately linked to the maintenance and operation of the federal system. American parties were traditionally organized in a highly decentralized manner. Indeed, less than 30 years ago a major authority on parties declared that:

There is perhaps no point on which writers on American politics are so . . . agreed as that our state and local party organizations, taken collectively, are far more powerful than our national party organizations. As Professor Macmahon puts it, "Considered nationally political parties in the United States may be described as loose alliances [. . . of state and local party organizations] to win the stakes of power embodied in the presidency.[5]

This system strongly reinforced constitutional provisions intended to ensure state representation in the federal government, such as the electoral college and the structure of the Senate. National office holders owed their election to state and local party organizations and were closely attuned to the vagaries of local politics. "In the United States," wrote Edward Banfield and James Q. Wilson, "the connection between local and national politics is peculiarly close. . . . Congressmen and Senators are essentially local politicians, and those of them who forget it soon cease to be politicians at all."[6] In fact, some members of Congress held important positions within state or local party organizations themselves and could be viewed as local as well as national political officials.

For their part, presidential candidates were chosen by an assemblage of independent state and local party chieftains at the national convention. Historically, the ranks of such candidates were often swelled by governors running as "favorite sons" and leading unified state delegations. Such leaders frequently sought to broker the convention's decision and perhaps to gain the nomination themselves as "dark horse" candidates. Once the nominations were made, the chosen candidates relied for their election upon the permanently organized state and local parties with their armies of adherents and party workers.

Thus, the traditional party system provided broad channels for representing the interests of state and local officials in national policymaking and strong mechanisms for protecting those interests in the political arena. As Morton Grodzins expressed it:

The parties . . . disperse power in favor of state and local governments. . . . States and localities, working through the parties, can assume that they will have an important role in many national programs. . . . [They] are more influential in federal affairs than the federal government is in theirs.[7]

The corresponding absence of party discipline and hierarchy at the national level often reinforced the decentralizing thrust of state and local party influence by raising obstacles to concerted legislative action in Washington. Because legislative opponents of the president and congressional party leaders were insulated from effective party sanctions—especially in the period after 1910—the natural difficulties of coalition building in a large and diverse nation were often magnified by national party weaknesses. On those rare occasions when presidents did attempt to use their political influence to defeat congressional opponents or to punish unreliable party members at the polls, their efforts generally failed dismally.

This is not to say that parties alone were responsible for maintaining governmental decentralization in the United States, nor that they were incapable of serving nationalizing purposes at specific points in time. During periods of national crisis, when strong leadership and popular support existed on behalf of vigorous and innovative federal policies, the parties served as convenient and necessary vehicles for mobilizing popular support and for encouraging effective legislative coalition building. At other times, the structure of the party system simply reinforced other factors promoting decentralization in the political system, notably the pervasive and intense popular attachment to the values of localism and laissez-faire, and constraints imposed on the federal government by reigning legal doctrines and provisions of the Constitution.

Over time, however, most of the explicit constitutional protections for states in the federal system were altered or eroded. Changing judicial interpretations greatly broadened the range of implied federal powers, and popular election of senators and presidential electors replace state legislative selection. Thus, by the early 1960s, prominent scholars widely credited the decentralized structure of American political parties with primary responsibility for shaping and preserving the decentralized character of the federal system itself. According to Grodzins:

The nature of American political parties accounts in largest part for the nature of the American governmental system. The specific point is that the parties are responsible for both the existence and form of the considerable measure of decentralization that exists in the United States.[8]

CHANGING ROLES OF PARTIES

Over the past 25 years, the role of political parties in American politics has departed increasingly from this traditional, decentralized system—so much so that veteran political observer Theodore White maintains that our political system has changed "so dramatically . . . as to amount to a revolution."[9] In the process, the parties' capacity to act as balance wheels in the federal system has diminished, in part because certain traditional party functions have been assumed by competing institutions—like the mass media—that are more national in scope and orientation.

PUBLIC ATTITUDES

For example, even though party identification remains the single most important factor influencing how most people vote, it appears to have lost much of its past effectiveness as a voting guide, and personal loyalties to parties have grown attenuated. The number of self-described political independents climbed from 22% of the population in 1952 to 35% in 1980 and encompassed a much broader cross-section of the population. In sharp contrast, the number of persons declaring a strong loyalty to either party declined from 35% to 23% of the population during this period.[10] Although party identification, especially among Republicans, appears to have made a significant rebound in 1984, it is presently unclear whether this constitutes a short- or long-term reversal of the post-1960 decline, or if it represents, perhaps, the beginning of a long-expected party realignment.[11] Nevertheless, faith in the parties has diminished sufficiently that, by 1983, an ACIR-Gallup poll found that almost half the population (45%) believed that organized interest groups best represent their political interests, compared with only 34% who believed that either of the major political parties does so.

Most important, there is little doubt that patterns of party voting have changed in recent years. Voters' willingness to defect from their party and vote for a candidate from another party has increased markedly. Over 60% of American voters reported that they "split their ticket" in 1980, compared with about one-third who did so in the 1950s.[12] Similarly, the percentage of congressional districts supporting a congressional candidate from one party and a presidential candidate from another averaged 35% in the 1970s, compared to just 25% in the 1950s.[13] Comparable behavior is apparent for other offices at all levels of government.

THE NOMINATING PROCESS

The weakening hold of parties on the electorate has been paralleled by the dwindling capacity of party organizations and leaders to control candidates' use of the party label in elections. This erosion in party control over nominations began at the state and local level in the wake of the widespread adoption of primary elections. Primaries were explicitly intended to reduce the influence of party organizations in the electoral process by removing control over nominations from party conventions and granting it directly to voters instead. Initially, and especially in states and localities with strong party organizations, party leaders were often able to circumvent this effect and retain control over the nominating process by stimulating high turnout among party stalwarts. But over time, as most party organizations have faltered in their ability to determine voter behavior in primaries, they have often lost their once effective and predictable control over nominations.

At the national level as well, presidential primaries during the 1960s began to erode the capacity of national party conventions to select the presidential nominee. Previously, primary elections had been used by party leaders mainly for advisory purposes, to test the viability and weaknesses of different candidates. Due in part to a series of far-reaching reforms in the Democratic Party's delegate selection process, however, the number of presidential primaries increased from 17 in 1968 to 31 in 1980 and the number of delegates selected by primaries rose to more than two-thirds of the total.[14]

In combination with other party reforms, the vastly increased role of primaries has significantly altered the process of selecting presidential candidates. The role of the media as an indispensable means of direct communication between candidates and voters has increased, as has the influence of political amateurs and dedicated issue activists who form the core of new, independently established candidate organizations. On the other hand, the influence of state and local parties and government officials has diminished as critical nominating decisions have been removed from inside the halls of the party convention and transferred to an often fluctuating and poorly defined primary electorate. As a result, the nominating process has become far more open and volatile, often benefiting lesser known and less established politicians who are able to capitalize on waves of publicity stemming from a few unexpected early primary victories.

These changes in the electorate and in the nominating process have combined with the availability of new and independent electoral resources to diminish the parties' role in conducting campaigns. Primary elections encourage candidates to develop an independent and personalized campaign organization to seize their party's nomination. Consequently, primary victors increasingly find that they have less need to rely on the support of party organizations during the general election.

This tendency has been strongly reinforced by: (1) the availability of new campaign technologies that allow candidates to communicate directly with voters; (2) the proliferation of independent campaign specialists and professional consultants who perform election tasks ranging from polling and media advising to overall campaign management and strategy; and (3) the vast expansion of non-party financial and organizational resources, including new sources of funding, increased electoral activity by organized groups, and the post-1960 influx of issue-oriented volunteers.

COMPETING INSTITUTIONS IN POLITICS

Paralleling and often reinforcing these changes in party functions has been the growing influence of competing institutions in the political arena: Media, interest groups, and financial organizations.

MASS MEDIA

Most significant, perhaps, has been the expanding role of the mass media in American politics.[15] Indeed, two noted scholars of the electoral process have characterized television as:

. . . the new political god. It has supplanted the political party as the main conduit between candidate and voter. It is the principal influence acting on the voter in a campaign and his chief source of information. It is the medium of information he is dependent on and the one he trusts most implicitly. However, it is both an expensive and unpredictable master.[16]

Changes in communications technology historically have had political and intergovernmental implications. One famed media analyst has gone so far as to argue that "a speed-up in communications always enables a central authority to extend its operations to more distant margins."[17] In the early years of the United States, news travelled slowly—limited by the sluggish pace of often primitive transportation—and the localistic pattern of communications tended to reinforce the decentralized system of governmental authority.[18] Moreover, newspapers at the time were often closely affiliated with political parties, frequently depending on them for news, patronage, and advertising and forming an integral part of their communications network.

This decentralizing influence of communications began to erode with the invention and application of the telegraph (in the 1840s) and radio (in the 1920s). Wire services and radio networks offered speed-of-light electronic communications between distant places, binding the nation much more closely together. In part because of the rise of the wire services, reporters adopted a less partisan—but somewhat more sensational—style of writing, calculated to please more diverse audiences.

The most significant changes, however, followed the introduction of television. Television has had a significant impact on politics and the news industry, as well as shaping popular culture and entertainment. Since 1963, when the networks first shifted from 15- to 30-minute evening newscasts, a majority of the population has said that television is its major source of news.

Intergovernmentally, the overall effect has been to shift the focus of political attention away from localities, away most particularly from the states, and toward the national government. The economics of broadcasting dictate that most network news stories originate in a comparatively small number of locations—with Washington and New York being the major focal points. Because television is at once more national in coverage and more political in content than other news media, there is reason to believe that its development has contributed to expanding the national agenda. At the same time, coverage of state and local government activities, by the media as a whole, often seems inadequate. Although the states enjoy essentially coequal status constitutionally, evidence suggests that this tier of government fares least well in terms of media coverage and public comprehension.[19]

Apart from such direct interactions between government and television, TV has also affected government through its impact on the political process. Summarizing his experiences from two decades of observing presidential elections, Theodore White argues that "American politics and television are now so completely intertwined that it is impossible to tell the story of one without the other."[20]

No aspect of the electoral process has been influenced more by television than presidential nominations. The glare of the cameras has helped erode the deliberative capacity of national conventions and reduced the role of state and local party leaders. At the same time, media coverage has magnified the importance of early state primaries and caucuses. Presidential nominating campaigns are now "brokered" by television commentators, opinion pollsters, and tiny electorates in such states as New Hampshire, Iowa, Maine, and Vermont. Many political observers believe that the personal attributes of successful nominees have been altered by the change of process.

During the course of the campaign itself, candidates now rely very heavily on television to reach voters, rather than upon the cadres of local party workers that once offered their aid. However, the cost of television time, and the fees of professional campaign managers who know how to use the media and other modern technologies, have created new forms of dependencies.

INTEREST GROUPS

Interest group developments in recent years have also affected the conduct of contemporary politics.[21] Although interest groups and voluntary associations have always been prominent features of American political culture, never have they been as numerous, entrenched, or politically active as they are today. Estimating the number of interest groups over time is a difficult task, but there is broad agreement that their ranks have grown. By one recent count the number of groups established between 1960 and 1980 increased by as much as 60%.[22]

On the whole, these modern interest groups contrast sharply with the traditionally decentralized parties by their heavy focus on Washington. Responding to "the increased salience of national politics," the number of groups represented in the nation's capital more than doubled in the 20 years after 1960.[23] This includes both groups that were formed in Washington and other previously established groups that migrated there. By far the fastest growing types of organizations have been citizen or "public interest" groups, civil rights and minority groups, social welfare organizations, and groups representing women, the elderly, and the handicapped. Because many of these organizations have relatively short life spans, however, and because business, trade, and professional associations also increased substantially in number, the overall distribution of group types represented in Washington has changed relatively little during this period.[24]

Many factors have contributed to interest group formation—from economic growth and specialization to rising levels of education—but a commonly overlooked source in recent years has been the federal government itself. As careful scholarship has documented, many recent groups were formed in response to new federal programs, as program clients and service providers banded together to share information and expand their resources.[25] Indeed, many groups have benefitted from direct governmental assistance to help them sustain or expand their operations.[26] Still other groups have organized for defensive purposes, responding to the perceived negative consequences of governmental action.

The increase in the size of the interest group population is only one component of their rise to prominence in national politics. Of equal significance have been changes in the way interest groups conduct their political activities. Many scholars contend that, during the last 20 years, interest groups have undergone a political metamorphosis. They have done so by adopting methods of influencing government policymakers that traditionally had been performed by political parties. The result has been a gradual blurring of the distinctions between interest group and party politics and, utlimately perhaps, a change in the political status of both.

Prior to 1964, interest groups in Washington primarily engaged in "institutional lobbying," focusing their efforts on influential legislators and administrators. Such lobbying usually consisted of exchanging technical advice and information, and, on occasion, applying various forms of political pressure. Seldom, if ever, did these kinds of political interactions include direct contributions to candidates for national office. Nor did they usually involve contact or interchanges with constituents on a daily basis.[27]

More recent research suggests that, in addition to these traditional activities of institutional lobbying, interest groups increasingly engage in broader forms of political activity, including political education, grassroots lobbying, coalition building, and electoral fundraising through political action committees.[28] Although traditional lobbying and information services still command the major share of most groups' resources, media contacts, coordinating efforts with other groups, and mobilizing mass membership campaigns are among the fastest growing interest group activities.

Although interest groups have always engaged in them to some extent, such techniques for financing campaigns, mobilizing the public, and building legislative coalitions have traditionally been the province of political parties. In the last few years, the functions of interest groups and the parties have continued to intersect even further. Although there have long been electoral relationships between the parties and certain interest groups, several groups have recently begun to devote substantial new financial and political resources to expanding their influence within the parties and to enlarging the scope of party activity in general. For example, some business interests have begun closely coordinating their electoral contributions with the Republican National Committee, while on the Democratic side, labor and education organizations have become intimately involved in the party's presidential nomination process.

CAMPAIGN FINANCE

Nowhere has the intersection of politics and interest groups changed more dramatically than in the field of campaign finance.[29] Interest-group-affiliated political action committees (PACs) have grown at an astonishing rate over the past ten years, from 608 in 1974 to 3,525 by January of 1983.[30] Moreover, PAC contributions to federal congressional campaigns alone increased from $11.2 million in 1974 (accounting for 15.7% of campaign funds) to $83.6 million in 1982 (about 28% of total funds).[31]

Although these data suggest much about contemporary group participation in politics, most important from an intergovernmental perspective are several nationalizing trends in campaign finance. First, in part because of the growing role of nationally-organized PACs, congressional (and some state and local) campaigns appear to be drawing larger proportions of funds from outside affected states or congressional districts. As one congressman lamented.

The state of Iowa is a classic example of the problem. We're mainly rural and small business, but in elections the Republicans are largely funded by business, much of which has nothing to do with the state, and the Democrats are funded by labor, much of which doesn't have anything to do with the state. . . . We're seeing regional politics and state and citizen politics become national. National groups determine outcomes whereas local constituencies used to provide the crucial role. This is new.[32]

This pattern of funding has become sufficiently common that another member of Congress, when asked why he accepted large contributions from out-of-state PACs, replied that "I just don't feel right asking constituents in my district for campaign funds." [33]

Second, federal campaign election laws have had a dampening effect on state and local party activities and financial contributions to congressional candidates. (For details, see "State Parties and the National Law of Campaign Finance," Intergovernmental Perspective, Fall 1984.) Finally, stemming partly from these legal provisions, the relatively powerful and expanding fiscal role of the national parties, especially the Republican, has given powerful intra-party impetus to the nationalization of campaign finance. The national party committees now contribute far more to congressional (and many state) candidates than in the past. Indeed, in recent elections, the national committees of both parties have far outstripped state and local committees in their contributions and expenditures on behalf of congressional candidates. In 1981-82, for example, spending in support of congressional candidates by state and local party committees totaled $1,627,964 for Democrats and $1,213,999 for Republican.[34] In contrast, such spending by the national, senatorial, and congressional committees equaled $3,437,602 for the Democrats and a whopping $18,697,179 for the Republicans (see Figure 1). Such large sums, in turn, reflect the sophisticated direct mail fundraising operations established by the national Republican committees in recent years and now being imitated by their Democratic counterparts. In the view of at least one observer, this financial development carries the potential for permanently reversing the historically decentralized structure of American political parties:

The decentralization and weak organizational structure characteristic of American parties at the national level are changing, and will continue to change until the parties . . . become national bureaucracies with hierarchies, divisions of labor, and so on.[35]

PARTY ADAPTATION AND NATIONALIZATION

These fiscal developments demonstrate clearly that, whatever loss in relative influence they may have suffered, political parties in the United States have begun adapting in complex and sophisticated ways to their new political environment. Overall, parties at both the state and national levels have enlarged their staffs and budgets, modernized their activities, and expanded the services they provide to candidates. Because the national parties have frequently assumed a leadership role in such adaptations, traditional patterns of party decentralization are being modified.

Although the national parties traditionally have been viewed as weak and part-time entities, by the latter 1970s striking gains were being made. Responding in part to party weaknessess apparent in the wake of the Watergate scandal, the Republican National Committee (RNC) launched a concerted effort to expand its resource base and organizational capabilities. National committee staff, which totaled an estimated 138 in the non-election year of 1967, grew to 220 by 1977,[36] At the same time, the committee's 1965 budget of $1.5 million was enlarged to $9.7 million by 1978.

This enhancement of party resources has allowed the Republican National Committee and its congressional counterparts to provide a broad array of expanded services both to candidates and to its state and local affiliates. At the congressional level, the party has shown unprecedented activity in recruiting and training strong candidates to run in targeted districts. It also provides an array of valuable electoral services, from sophisticated polling to fundraising assistance and co-ordinating PAC contributions to candidates. Finally, the RNC has engaged in large-scale programs of television advertising in recent years that provide a nationwide political umbrella for Republican candidates.

Although it has remained respectful of state party prerogatives, the Republican National Committee (RNC) has also become involved in a range of activities at the state and local level. In addition to recruiting and assisting congressional candidates at the district level, it has provided a range of contributions and services to gubernatorial and state legislative candidates in selected races. In 1980, for example, it spent $3 million in assisting more than 4,000 state legislative candidates, including direct financial contributions of $1.7 million. Moreover, the RNC has engaged in a variety of efforts to help modernize state and county party organizations and to improve their fundraising and candidate-assistance capabilities. Organizationally, then, the national Republican party has assumed a strong role in modernizing the party, reversing the traditional pattern of weak national leadership. As Leon Epstein observes, "the Republicans have nationalized their party effort by a method analogous to the federal government's grant-in-aid system." [37]

The national Democratic party has engaged in a process of nationalization as well, although it began in a distinctly different fashion. Over the course of the past 20 years, the Democratic party has begun to depart from the traditional confederal pattern of party structure—characterized by the legal independence and political autonomy of state and local party organizations—by asserting the national party's control over the presidential delegate selection process and promoting broadened citizen participation in party affairs. "The old hegemony of the state parties [has been] broken," conclude Huckshorn and Bibby, "at least in the area of delegate selection." [38]

Although the promulgation of new and frequently elaborate national party rules affecting this process has sometimes led to conflicts with state and local parties, the Supreme Court has affirmed the national party's authority to regulate its own affairs, even granting it precedence over contradictory state laws. Indeed, the Court's recognition of broad national party authority may ultimately rank among the most significant developments affecting the intergovernmental balance of power in party affairs, for both Democrats and Republicans. In addition, such decisions could have major repercussions for state regulation of state and local political parties if similar reasoning is applied to judgments at that level.[39]

The Democratic National Committee (DNC) and its congressional counterparts have also begun to emulate the successful organizational initiatives of the RNC. Although the DNC lags far behind in fundraising and candidate contributions, it has started to develop an expanded direct mail fundraising operation; to offer additional resources, training, and services to congressional candidates; and to experiment with a small program of national party advertisements. It has also attempted in recent years to assist in modernizing state party activities and to enhance Democratic participation in elections through get-out-the-vote efforts.

Significant efforts have been undertaken to modernize parties at the state level as well. Available evidence suggests that most state party organizations today are more professional, employ larger and more specialized staffs, have larger budgets, and engage in a wider range of services and activities than did their counterparts in the early 1960s.

Despite the overall growth in state party organizational capacity, however, state parties continue to vary considerably in terms of their resources and capabilities. Some, especially in many small states and in the South and West where party organizations traditionally have been weak, have only begun to join in the process of party modernization. Variations in resources and capacities are even greater at the local level, although virtually all of the once powerful local "machines" have disappeared. Thus, whatever the ultimate influence of parties vis-a-vis their functional competitors, it is clear that the relative balance of influence and resources within the parties has significantly shifted over time.

BEHAVIORAL RESPONSES TO THE NEW POLITICAL ENVIRONMENT

Taken as a whole, these political developments have had important implications for the conduct of politics, the behavior of elected officials, and ultimately for intergovernmental relations. These effects have been especially evident in Congress. Although it was not uncommon in the past for Senators and Representatives to be active in or closely linked to state and local party organizations, most members today have adopted highly independent political styles. "The conditions favoring individualistic politicians," observes one congressional scholar, "have become even more prevalent now than in the past."[40]

This situation reflects both contemporary party inadequacies and the growing significance of nonparty political resources. Thus, most current members of Congress report little interaction with or reliance upon state and local party resources. Even by the early 1960s, a commonly accepted view among members of Congress was that "If we depended on the party organization to get elected, none of us would be here."[41] More recently, an indepth study of the "home styles" of 18 congressmen discovered that:

. . . in only two or three cases is there an integrated working relationship between the congressman's personal organization and the local party organization. That is exactly the way most of our House members want it—separate organizations pursuing separate tasks. The task of the congressman's personal organization is to keep him in Congress. . . . Most members . . . prefer to remain minimally involved in local politics, not to become local political leaders.[42]

As previously indicated, numerous resources now exist that permit members of Congress—and other major political officials—to build personalized campaign organizations capable of winning elections with little party help or even over party opposition. Moreover, once elected to office, most members of Congress find that their legislative and constituent service responsibilities provide additional opportunities for developing direct and positive relationships with constituents of both political parties and for cementing the loyalties of past supporters.

Nowhere is the changing role played by parties in congressional elections more evident that in the changing sources and expenditures of campaign funds. In 1982, congressional candidates spent approximately $343 million on their campaigns, of which an estimated $100 million was devoted to television advertising.[43] Only 2% of total campaign contributions in that election were obtained from party sources (not including indirect expenditures in support of party candidates) down from 17% ten years earlier (see Figure 2).[44] And, as has been shown, that party assistance which is provided comes increasing from national committees.

Enhanced political independence by members of Congress has both positive and negative ramifications for voters, legislators, and the political system as a whole. The most apparent intergovernmental repercussion, however, has been declining interdependence between state and local parties and members of Congress. As former congressman Abner Mikva has written, modern legislators—because of their electoral independence—have "little or no loyalty to the state organization" upon their arrival in Washington.[45] This assessment is reaffirmed by others, who stress the increased importance of non-party sources of campaign finance.

Congressional and senatorial candidates must rely heavily on nonparty sources for funds. Therefore, representatives and senators, once in office, feel little sense of obligation to their state and local parties, and the parties lack significant influence on the behavior of legislators in the halls of Congress.[46]

THE NEW POLITICS AND INTERGOVERNMENTAL POLICY

As the preceding section has demonstrated, the American political system has been significantly altered—and in several respects nationalized—over the past quarter century. Political parties today are less important than in past years as channels for state and local influence and communication in the federal system, while the relative role of the parties; national committees has greatly expanded. As the political significance of national sources of campaign finance have also increased, voters and public officials alike have altered long familiar patterns of behavior.

Utltimately, the most critical issue raised by these developments concerns their effects on the practical operations of government and on the substance of public policy. The general absence of direct and precise links between political changes and specific government policies tends to cloud this issue in a wealth of ambiguities, and individual assessments of the outcomes are subject to widely varying standards of evaluation. Nevertheless, a number of significant institutional and policy consequences have been convincingly linked to contemporary political change, including some that directly affect federalism and intergovernmental policy and others that involve the governmental system as a whole.

On the broadest level, most observers believe that the political system today is more open, more responsive, and more sensitive to specific issues than in the past. At least during the late 1960s and 1970s, voters' attitudes toward major public issues appeared to exert a greater influence over their decision at the ballot box than was true in the 1950s, while the independent influence of party identification and social group affiliation declined.[47] Moreover, political convensions are now far more representative of women and minorities.[48] New groups—and new forms of interest groups—today play an active role in the nation's capital, represent a wider spectrum of political interests, and utilize new channels of access to public opinion through the mass media and modern technology. Finally, the national legislature has become more responsive to citizen initiatives and more active in identifying new issues of public policy.

At ths same time, many observers believe that contemporary political system is excessivly fragmented, volatile, and hyperresponsive to narrowly defined interests. Opinion analysts have detected "a much more volatile electorate . . . active and involved—but . . . with weaker institutional ties."[49] Political conventions—while more representative of major demographic segments of the population—appear to be increasingly dominated by dedicated issue activists, largely out of step with the party rank and file.[50] Moreover, because of high levels of political fragmentation both inside and outside of Congress, many observers believe that the always difficult task of legislative coalition building has become even more difficult, as members find it more and more costly to exert the political discipline needed to resolve the hard political decisions of the day.[51] At least one authority on Congress has related such problems directly to the declining influence of political parties:

Why . . . do we hear all the contemporary hoopla about single-issue groups? Probably because politicians fear them now more than before and thus allow them to play a larger role in our politics. Why should this be so? Simply because the parties are too weak to protect their members and thus to contain single-issue politics.[52]

These issues are of obvious concern to citizens and public officials alike. Within the context of American politics as a whole, they have significant ramifications for federalism and intergovernmental policymaking.

INTERGOVERNMENTAL CONSEQUENCES

CONGRESS AND INTERGOVERNMENTAL PROGRAMS

Some analysts detect a more direct relationship between the declining influence of state and local parties on Congress and the content of recent intergovernmental policy. National policy activism and historic rates of growth in federal governmental responsibilities were among the most significant inter-governmental developments of the last quarter century. Although many factors contributed to this growth, political change and declining state and local party influence appear to have played a significant role. As Lewis Kaden has argued:

The last twenty-five years have brought enormous changes in the types of persons elected to the Senate and the House, and the techniques used in their successful campaigns. The core element in this transformation has been the decline in importance of state party organization . . . . As Senators and Members of the House develop independent constituencies among groups such as farmers, businessmen, laborers, environmentalists, and the poor, each of which generally supports certain national initiatives, their tendency to identify with state interests and the positions of state officials is reduced.[53]

Specifically, changes in the political environment of Congress appeared to influence both the scope and the design of intergovernmental programs. As more and more members of Congress felt encouraged or compelled in recent years to build independent ad hoc political coalitions back home, the role of policy entrepreneur became increasingly prevalent. Initiating new programs and demonstrating legislative activism proved to be useful methods both for strengthening alliance with politically helpful interest groups and for appealing to individual constituents. The activities of former Representative John Brademas epitomized this electoral strategy. In 1968, Brademas reportedly utilized his legislative position on the House Education and Labor Committee to "mobilize the education community" on behalf of a difficult reelection bid.[54] Later, he authored and helped enact a new federal aid program, the Environmental Education Act of 1970, which enabled him to demonstrate his commitment to a highly popular issue. As two of his former staff assistants have written:

Brademas [D-IN] felt very strongly that Congress can and should play a significant role as initiator and creator of public policy. . . . [T]he Environmental Education Act was his baby; he authored it, he felt responsible for it. . . . [T]he environmental response was becoming a burning and timely political issue in late 1969. . . . This bill gave Brademas a perfect opportunity to move into the environmental area, such opportunities would be limited for members of the Education Committee.[55]

Similar cases of intergovernmental policy entrepreneurship abound in the legislative annals of the 1960s and 1970s.[56]

The end results of this new legislative style were often paradoxical. Although individual initiatives were often responsive to legitimate interest group and constituency needs, their cumulative effect upon citizen attitudes toward government and on the intergovernmental system as a whole appeared to be counterproductive.[57] Meanwhile, many members of Congress found that legislative activism provided no substitute for stable coalitions at the local level and began perceiving their environment as a legislative treadmill. No matter what new programs were enacted, the popular attitude seemed increasingly to be: "What have you done for me lately?" [58]

Such political pressures have not only affected the overall scope of the intergovernmental system, they have significantly influenced program structures and design as well. At least throughout the 1960s and 1970s, Congress demonstrated a strong preference for narrowly defined categorical grants and tended to resist efforts at carefully targeting federal programs to neediest areas and individuals. As David Mayhew has emphasized, categorical grants can be a particularly useful congressional tool for building electoral support. Because they provide "particularized benefits" to discrete congressional constituencies, they enable legislators to claim political credit for tangible benefits delivered to their districts.[59]

Another often overlooked policy development in the last 1960s and 1970s was the enormous expansion that took place in intergovernmental regulation. As fiscal constraints on federal spending grew in the 1970s, intergovernmental regulation became increasingly popular as a means of permitting continued congressional activism while placing most of the costs onto state and local governments. By one count, 34 major regulatory statutes were adopted between 1964 and 1980, each directly or indirectly regulating state and local governments in new and intrusive ways.[60] As one former official in the Johnson administration has observed:

Confronted with a problem and a showing that other levels of government are "defaulting," [Congress'] strong tendency is to pass a law. [In the 1960s], money was Washington's antidote for problems. Now, the new fiscal realities mean that Congress provides fewer dollars. Still determined to legislate against problems, Congress uses sticks instead of carrots.[61]

STATE AND LOCAL REPRESENTATION IN WASHINGTON

State and local governments also responded to the new political environment. Following the well-worn path trod by countless other groups, organizations representing the full-range of state and local officials—from the state house to townhall—have either located in Washington or established major offices there. Especially when viewed in historic perspective, this trend has been striking. In 1957, the National Association of Counties had a professional staff of one and a budget of $18,000. Twenty-five years later, its staff had swelled to 60 and its budget totalled $5 million.[62] The U.S. Conference of Mayors, which had a budget of $88,000 in 1960, had grown to a $3.5 million operation by 1983 with a staff of 40. In 1954, the Conference of Mayors was joined in Washington by the American Municipal Association (now the National League of Cities), which by 1983 had a staff of 55 and a budget of $4.5 million. Perhaps the most dramatic change occurred in the case of the National Governors Association (formerly the National Governors Conference), which did not open a Washington office until 1967. Fifteen years later the NGA had a staff of 70, a budget of $5.4 million, and had established a Washington center housing numerous individual states and affiliated organizations. During the 1960s and 1970s, many individual cities and countries also expanded their Washington presence by establishing independent offices or hiring a part-time national representative. Localities, too, have been joined by a host of specialized organizations and others, like the National Association of Towns and Townships, representing smaller jurisdictions.

Some have interpreted this expanded organizational presence as a sign of growing state and local political strength and sophistication. Clearly it has helped enable subnational officials to play a leading role in enacting and shaping certain major pieces of federal legislation, such as general revenue sharing and community development block grants. At the same time, however, this organizational boom also reflects erosion in the unique political role once occupied by these officials and their party organizations in the political system. Viewed from this perspective, it constitutes a form of compensation for lost political influence rather than a sign of mounting strength. As Haider expressed it: "For governors and mayors, individually and collectively, national party influence is generally declining. . . . [They] have acted upon the political necessity of banding together to deal with their federal constituencey." [63] Although their direct channels of representation have been enhanced, state and local officials are now viewed increasingly in Washington—not as uniquely constituted co-governors—but as a few more voices among a multitude of special interest claimants.

POLITICAL CHANGE AND FEDERAL VALUES

In the broadest sense, these congressional and public interest group developments testify to the degree to which contemporary changes in the political system have had important intergovernmental consequences. Such changes have served to open national political processes to new responsibilities and new constituents. But at the same time they may have helped to alter the very nature of the federal system. In the view of one authority on federalism:

[We] have moved to a system in which it is taken as axiomatic that the federal government shall initiate policies and programs, shall determine their character, shall delegate their administration to the state and localities according to terms that it alone determines, and shall provide for whatever intervention on the part of its administrative agencies as it deems necessary to secure compliance with those terms.[64]

Agrees another academic observer:

Over the past fifteen years the United States has crossed the fault line from a federal system to a decentralized national system. . . . When it comes time to make policy, all eyes look to Washington, and federalism is viewed as one among many crosspressures rather than as a pathway through them. When it comes time to implement policy, federalism is transformed into a managerial model in which the states and localities are cast in the roles of middle and lower echelons of management that cannot be trusted to follow orders without being paid off and reined in. The political idea of states as polities and localities as communities has all but disappeared.[65]

Such pessimistic assessments of the contemporary status of American federalism are not universally shared. Some noted observers perceive, instead, that our governmental institutions are poised to enter a bold new era of decentralization.[66] Adherents to this view point to recent actions by a national administration publicly committed to fostering a "new federalism," and they emphasize the growing fiscal constraints confronting the federal budget. Moreover, the extraordinarily high levels of party unity exhibited in Congress on key economic and spending issues in 1981, coming in the wake of unprecedented national party activity in the 1980 congressional elections, may indicate the potential of future party-building efforts for enhancing Congress' capacity to confront broad and complex public issues in a comprehensive fashion.

As the nation's constitutional bicentennial approaches, basic and perennial issues of governmental performance—and the political system's role in promoting or hampering them—will receive renewed public attention and reflection. Among the issues certain to be considered will be the federal system's performance in furthering the values it has traditionally been viewed as promoting: integrating and preserving diverse community values within a shared national framework; providing multiple arenas of meaningful public expression and participation; promoting policy experimentation and programmatic diversity; maintaining an effective system of shared and separated powers; and promoting more effective and responsive government by avoiding unworkable concentrations of public responsibility.

If these values remain major public priorities and the federal system continues to be viewed as an effective governmental instrument to achieve them, then methods of assuring federalism's vitality through our political system will remain important items on the public agenda. In a political culture geared increasingly to the reflexive pursuit of more direct forms of democracy, thoughtful citizens may wish to place greater emphasis on representative instruments like political parties and federalism that help to manage and constrain the political agenda and impose greater structure on the policy-making process.

At bedrock, the maintenance of federalism is not a political end in itself but a vehicle to broader public goals. If the influence of state and local political institutions wanes, important avenues of public participation may wither. To the extent that local governmental and political bodies constitute "training schools of democracy," as Tocqueville put it, the civic foundations of democratic government are at stake. Moreover, the erosion of federalism's capacity to provide a territorial dimension to political representation that is distinct from the functionalism of interest group pluralism may rob our national governing bodies of a useful and important perspective in the making of public policy.[67] Thus, the stakes in the evolution of American politics extend beyond issues of distributing power and influence among the different levels of government, but address the wellsprings and vitality of democracy itself.

THE CHAIRMAN'S VIEW

DEAR READER: In December, ACIR held a grand dinner to celebrate its 25th anniversary. The evening celebrated many of those individuals who gave so much of their time and energy to the formation and success of ACIR. Portraits of Frank Bane, our first Chairman, and Bill Coleman, our first executive director, were unveiled. Likewise, Senator Muskie and Congressman Fountain were singled out for their contributions to the Commission.

We were also celebrating more than individuals. We were celebrating an idea and an approach to government. Soon we will begin to celebrate these ideas through the bicentennial of the drafting and ratification of the Constitution. There is no more appropriate time to remind ourselves of ACIR's role in the federal republic. For it is that role that gives us steadfastness of purpose and clarity regarding our objectives.

There is no better place to start than with the Founding Fathers. While the Founding Fathers did not see the need to create an ACIR, they would see its need today. Then as now, problems plague relationships between the national government and the states. The Articles of Confederation created a weak national government, one incapable of bringing equal means to bear upon pressing problems of the day. The constitutional convention in Philadelphia was in direct response to these problems.

Their answer to these problems was the creation of a general government with adequate authority to pursue national objectives. The Founding Fathers thought that the division of powers within the general government as well as between it and the states would remain in equilibrium providing balance and reasonable government. Yet there was an even more fundamental principle in operation. The Founding Fathers held that good government could be brought about through reflection and choice rather than by accident and force. In other words, citizens could create their governments through reflection on the first principles, morals, and politics.

While few governments had ever been created through reflection and choice, none had been created on the scale of our experiment in self-governance, with the burden placed upon citizens to be not only their own governors but also to be constitution makers in deciding the rules by which their governments would operate. Yet the ability to reflect and choose implies that citizens have alternatives and information regarding the likely consequences of selecting one form of organization over another.

This is precisely where ACIR's role begins. In an increasingly complex federal system, there must be agencies committed to providing citizens and policymakers with well-thought-out studies on important issues facing the federal system. However, to be of value these studies must be more than mere factual summations of existing research. They must also meet the following criteria:

They must provide citizens and policymakers with a range of well-reasoned alternatives from which they can reflect and choose. This does not hinder the Commission from taking positions—far from it. Rather it lays down the basis upon which the commission and others can choose.

Our studies must pay particular attention to the role that citizens play as constitution makers as well as governors. For these roles were the cornerstone of the American revolution in self governance.

We must seek ways to bring about equilibrium in the federal system. Not only between the federal and state governments but also between state and local governments.

Finally, we must broaden our network of constituents to include those not commonly thought to be part of the intergovernmental system. Neighborhoods, special districts, and townships are important players in the intergovernmental system; we should understand their role in and contribution to a healthy federal system.

Some have questioned whether ACIR has outlived its usefulness.

VIEW FROM THE COMMISSION

DEAR READER: One of the few things growing faster than the national debt these days is the role of Political Action Committees (PACs) in financing federal elections. The October report of the Federal Election Commission showed PAC contributions to 1984 congressional campaigns up 143% over 1980 levels. PACs were also credited with a 250% rise in "independent expenditures," so called because they are made without consulting any candidate.

By contrast, the same report showed that political party contributions had made up less than 2% of all funds raised in these races, indicating that many of the activities formerly conducted by parties are now being performed by PACs.

These intriguing data support the basic premise underlying the ongoing study by the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, "Transformations in American Politics and Their Implications for Federalism." Our political process is undergoing swift and fundamental change. And partly as a result of the way we have responded to these changes, the incentives for decisionmakers at all levels of government are much different today than they were 30, 20 or even 10 years ago.

On examination, few would dispute that federalism has been among the casualties of this new political order. Once labor-intensive affairs, successful federal election campaigns required extensive coordination among myriad ward bosses, majors and other officials at the state and local levels. But today, these campaigns tend to be expensive, centrally run media operations, often carried out with little, if any, need for cooperation from politicians at the lower levels of government. Contributing to this trend has been the increased election role of the national parties, which has helped to undermine state and local party autonomy.

This diminished role for non-federal polls has, in turn, led to a growing lack of symmetry in intergovernmental relations. We find today's Congress increasingly unresponsive to state and local concerns on such basic issues as federal preemption. Yet, having frequently deployed state and local governments as administrative instruments of federal policy, Congress exhibits little regard for their political and managerial concerns.

Grant simplification, inter-governmental regulatory reform, and a variety of needed improvements to state-implemented national law have long occupied the back-burner of national politics. Sadly, the diminished influence of state and local officials in Washington has left no one to hold the Congress accountable for the institutional concerns of state and local governments. The decline in state party organizations is certainly a contributing factor to this phenomenon.

Regardless of how reasonable, any effort to turn this situation around is bound to encounter difficult political obstacles, for the decline of congressional sensitivity to state and local institutional concerns has been mirrored by increased sensitivity to powerful special interests. These actors include "economic" and other moneyed interests, which, through PAC and individual contributions, fund candidates' access to media, as well as the self-described "public interest" activists, who influence legislators primarily through their access to free media publicity and their disproportionate weight in party nomination decisions.

Not surprisingly, many of these interest groups have a major stake in today's centralized policymaking process. Lobbies representing everything from highway construction to spending for the elderly would find it immeasurably more difficult to press their categorical agendas under a truly decentralized federal system, in which strong state party organizations would mediate among competing political interests. Many such groups could be expected to exert strong opposition to new decentralizing schemes.

Nevertheless, it remains both possible and desirable to upgrade the political roles of nonfederal officials and their party organizations through reforms designed to channel campaign contributions through state and local political parties. In fact, many of the current campaign funding channels were created as an unintended result of the Federal Election Campaign Act (FECA) reforms of the 1970s.

These earlier reforms placed strict limits on the amounts that parties, PACs and individuals could contribute to federal campaigns, with the principal goal being limiting the role of money in politics. However, because PACs could proliferate, while parties could not, the main effect of these reforms was to enhance greatly the importance of non-party contributors in the election process at the expenses of state party organizations.

In my opinion, these mistakes should be corrected. Ceilings on party contributions to federal candidates can be safely eliminated if combined with measures to preclude parties from becoming conduits for corruption. These and other reforms can be used to enhance the role of state and local party organizations in funding federal elections, and, with it, the influence of nonfederal officials in the legislative process.

At the same time, plans which seek to limit PAC contributions should be viewed with great caution. Such reforms would run afoul of the constitutional rights of Americans to participate in this political process, and would merely channel more campaign financing into "independent expenditures," which the Supreme Court has said are not subject to financial limits. We must remember that PACs are a legitimate form of political expression, and have actually helped to increase citizen involvement in the electoral process.

Notably, the need for sensible campaign finance reform extends beyond the issue of federalism and intergovernmental relations. With the parties no longer providing significant election support to congressional candidates, legislators have found themselves increasingly compelled to seek campaign funding from highly personalized coalitions of special interests. This situation has enhanced the ability of interest groups to undermine legislative discipline in Congress. And it has been this lack of legislative discipline that is largely responsible for our stalemate on such hotly contested, but vital, public issues as deficit reduction and tax reform.

While I cannot speak for all of my colleagues on the Commission, I believe it is essential that Congress undertake a timely review of the Federal Election Campaign Act, and that states also examine their own laws regulating political parties. Our investigation of this subject will hopefully stimulate awareness at all levels of government as to the broad significance of this arcane area of the law.

Once again, the Commission is to be commended for its illuminating insights into a major policy issue affecting the nation. I cannot think of any more important intergovernmental issue than the state of our political party system.

INTERGOVERNMENTAL ASPECTS OF FECA: STATE PARTIES AND CAMPAIGN FINANCE

(Cynthia C. Colella)

A national law regulating the conduct of campaigns for national elective office, the Federal Election Campaign Act (FECA), is seldom thought of as having intergovernmental ramifications. Yet those offices covered by FECA, although national, represent single states or districts within single states. As a result, they are of intense interest to states and localities and to state and local constituencies. In addition, though treated somewhat differently by the law than other political committees which support candidates for federal office, state and local party committees—like their federal counterparts—are subject to the gamut of FECA requirements and limitations. These requirements and limitations affect the structure and operation of political parties at all levels. Finally, by design or effect, certain provisions of the law appear to have strengthened the national parties relative to their subnational counterparts, thus possibly contributing to the trend toward the nationalization of campaign finance.

THE ANTIPROLIFERATION RULE

Under the contribution limits of FECA, the national political party commmittees are given a distinct advantage over other political committees (see Tables I and II).

TABLE I.—FECA: DEFINITIONS IN BRIEF

FECA

The Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, as amended in 1974, 1976, 1977 and 1979.

POLITICAL COMMITTEE

A group that meets one of the following conditions:

1. Any local unit of a political party (excluding a state committee) which: receives contributions aggregating over $5,000 during a calendar year; makes contributions or expenditures aggregating over $1,000 during a calendar year; or makes payments aggregating over $5,000 during a calendar year for activities exempted from the definition of contribution and expenditure.

2. Any state unit of a political party which receives contributions or makes expenditures aggregating in excess of $1,000 during a calendar year.

3. Any authorized committee regardless of how much it receives or spends, once the individual who authorized the committee becomes a candidate.

4. Any separate segregated fund, upon its establishment.

5. Any other organization, club, association, or group of persons that receives contributions or makes expenditures aggregating in excess of $1,000 during a calendar year.

PARTY COMMITTEE

A political committee which represents a political party and is part of the official party structure at the national, state, or local level.

LOCAL PARTY COMMITTEE

A political committee which functions at the level of a local party organization.

STATE PARTY COMMITTEE

A political committee which, by virtue of the bylaws of a political party, is responsible for the day-to-day operation of the party at the state level.

NATIONAL PARTY COMMITTEES

Political committees established and maintained by a national political party. A party's national committee, House campaign committee, and Senate campaign committee are defined as national party committees.

AFFILIATED COMMITTEES

Committees that are considered one political committee for purposes of contribution limits.

A state party committee is presumed to be affiliated with the local party committees within the state unless a local committee can demonstrate its independence.

All authorized committees of the same candidate are affiliated.

All political committees established, financed, maintained or controlled by the same person, group, corporation or labor organization are affiliated.

MULTICANDIDATE COMMITTEE

A political committee with more than 50 contributors that has been registered for at least 6 months and, with the exception of state party committees, has made contributions to 5 or more candidates for federal office.

SEPARATE SEGREGATED FUND

A political committee established by a corporation (profit or nonprofit), labor organization, or incorporated membership organization.

CONTRIBUTION

Anything of value given to (or provided on behalf of) a candidate or political committee to influence a federal election.

EXPENDITURE

A purchase or payment made to influence a federal election.

INDEPENDENT EXPENDITURE

An expenditure for a communication expressly advocating the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate that is not made with the cooperation or prior consent of, or in consultation with, or at the request or suggestion of, any candidate or his/her authorized committees or agents.

COORDINATED PARTY EXPENDITURES

Limited expenditures made by party committees on behalf of federal candidates in general election campaigns.

TABLE II.—CONTRIBUTION LIMITS UNDER FECA

Contributions from	Contributions to: Candidate or his/her authorized committee	National party committee [1] per calendar year	Any other committee per calendar year	Total contributions per calendar year
Individual	$1,000 per election [2]	$20,000	$5,000	$25,000
Multicandidate committee [4]	$1,000 per election	$15,000	$5,000	No limit
Party committee	$1,000 or $5,000 [3] per election.	No limit [5]	$5,000	No limit
Republican or Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee,[6] or the National Party Committee, or a combination of both.	$17,500 to Senate candidate per calendar year in which candidate seeks election.	NA	NA	NA
Any other committee or group.	$1,000 per election	$20,000	$5,000	No limit

[1] For purposes of this limit, each of the following is considered a national party committee: a party's national committee, the Senate Campaign committees and the National Congressional committees, provided they are not authorized by any candidate.

[2] Calendar year extends from January 1 through December 31. Individual contributions made or earmarked to influence a specific election of a clearly identified candidate are counted as if made during the year in which the election is held.

[3] Each of the following elections is considered a separate election: primary election, general election, runoff election, special election, and party caucus or convention which has authority to select the nominee.

[4] A multicandidate committee is any committee with more than 50 contributors which has been registered for at least 6 months and, with the exception of State party committees, has made contributions to 5 or more Federal candidates.

[5] Limit depends on whether or not party committee is a multicandidate committee.

[6] Republican and Democratic Senatorial Campaign committees are subject to all other limits applicable to a multicandidate committee.

[7] Group includes an organization, partnership or group of partners.

Notably, however, those advantages accrue only to parties at the national level. For purposes of contribution limitations, state and local party committees are legally considered to be just like other political committees—e.g., political action committees (PACs). Indeed, this even-handed treatment is fairly extensive, including in its reach a Federal Election Commission (FEC) provision known as the "antiproliferation rule." Originally designed to ensure against single businesses or unions setting up a number of different segregated funds to circumvent FECA's contribution limits, the FEC has also applied the antiproliferation rule to political parties and, in so doing, has decided that with rare exceptions state and local parties are one for the purposes of contribution and expenditure limits. In other words, local parties are legally assumed to be affiliates of the state parties in much the same way that divisional units of corporations are viewed as the affiliates of those groups. Consequently, a state party and all the local parties within a particular state share a single limit.

Because the national party and Senate campaign committees share a much higher contribution limit and the U.S. House of Representatives campaign committees are exempt from joint contribution restrictions, state and local parties find themselves at a distinct financial disadvantage. Hence, "Senate candidates can receive three and half times more from their national party than from the state party whose nominee they are, and House candidates can receive twice as much." [1]

COORDINATED EXPENDITURES

In 1976, the Supreme Court overturned some portions of FECA that restricted expenditures on the basis that such restrictions were in violation of First Amendment free speech guarantees. As a result, individuals and groups may now make unlimited expenditures for the purpose of "advocating the election or defeat of clearly identified candidate(s)" as long as those expenditures are "not made with the cooperation or prior consent of" any candidate or her/his agents.[2] This type of independent expenditure has been denied political parties at all levels on the assumption that they can never genuinely disconnect themselves from candidates bearing their labels.

A special category of expenditures, therefore, has been created for parties: coordinated expenditures. So named because the expenditures may be made in coordination with a candidate's campaign, the party rather than the candidate must actually do the spending. Although being able to coordinate expenditures with their candidates may be seen as giving the parties an advantage over other groups and individuals, critics are quick to point out a corresponding disadvantage. Unlike independent expenditures which are unlimited by law, coordinated expenditures are subject to per candidate limits.

AGENCY AGREEMENTS

The subject of coordinated expenditures takes on a more overtly intergovernmental cast when state party committees allow national party committees to act as their spending agents. Such agency agreements are the offspring of a provision of FECA which holds that "[t]he limitations on contributions . . . do not apply to transfers between and among political committees which are national, State, district, or local committees . . . of the same political party."

[1] Footnotes at end of article.

Beginning in 1978, however, a number of state GOP party committees authorized the National Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee (NRSC) to spend their funds—in other words, to act as their agent for spending purposes—a practice subsequently upheld by the Supreme Court.

Although most observers feel that unlimited funds transfers are a perfectly acceptable feature of the law, some are less than sanguine about their newest permutation: agency agreements allowing national party committees to spend state party funds. Thus, political scientist and North Carolina state party chair David Price has commented:

I really think unlimited transfers of funds between state and national party units is still desirable. [However,] I'm not sure . . . that simply letting the national party absorb the state parties' spending entitlements is desirable. . . . I'm not sure that's a healthy development from the standpoint of the strength of our state parties.[3]

THE 1979 AMENDMENTS: REVITALIZATION OR INTERGOVERNMENTAL LOOPHOLE?

In 1979, Congress amended portions of FECA. In so doing, it was responding to complaints that the statute discouraged state and local parties from engaging in grassroots activities. As President Ford's campaign manager observed in 1976.

One of the major results of the spending limitations has been to encourage the development of highly centralized campaign organizations with elaborate controls over spending. . . . The experience of the Ford campaign in 1976 showed conclusively that it was easier to discourage grassroots activity than to try to control it and report it. In previous campaigns, it was possible to tell a local campaign or party official to go ahead with a project as long as he could raise the money to finance it. Now, federal law places a premium on actively discouraging such activity because of the danger that it could well lead to a violation of the spending or contribution limits in the primary. Furthermore, in the general election, because no contributions are permitted once federal funds become available, it is even more important to discourage such activity.[4]

In response, the 1979 amendments: allowed state and local party groups to buy campaign materials for voluntary activities, unencumbered by spending limits, and permitted unlimited spending by state and local parties for purposes of voter registration and get-out-the-vote drives on behalf of presidential tickets.

These amendments have been praised as an important first step toward rekindling state and local party viability—encouraging those longtime bulwarks of the party system to engage in the sort of grassroots activities that have been their traditional forte.

SOFT MONEY

On the other hand, as the now popular journalistic term "soft money" implies, some feel that the 1979 amendments are less notable as a means of strengthening state and local party committee involvement in federal elections than as a convenient loophole for circumventing the intent of FECA.

"Soft money" has been so named because it involves the use of funds—from corporate treasuries, union dues, and large individual donors—that cannot directly be contributed to federal elections. Such funding sources are, however, legal in many states and presumably allowable under the 1979 contribution and expenditure exemptions for party-building activities.[5]

The use of the 1979 amendments as a soft money vehicle first manifest itself during the 1980 campaigns, with the Republican National Committee (RNC) raising and spending approximately nine million such dollars.[6] The idea quickly caught on and [b]oth parties now see soft money as a way of supercharging their presidential campaigns. Both have active programs to collect cash and channel it through their state brethren.[7]

In 1984, Democrats planned to raise between $20 and $27 million through a separate Democratic Victory Fund. Of that amount, about $15 to $16 million was scheduled to be channelled through Democratic parties "in 20 key states" for registration and get-out-the-vote drives.[8] Although no figures were set for similar GOP activities, sources estimated the amounts to range between $10 and $14 million.[9]

Critics contend that it has been primarily the national—rather than state and local—party committees which have coordinated the raising, distribution, and use of soft monies. They view the 1979 amendments in practice more as a gignatic statutory loophole for national party spending rather than an effective means of energizing state and local parties. According to critic Elizabeth Drew:

The theory was that the state parties should be able to participate in the publicly financed Presidentital campaign. . . . But in 1980 the national parties assumed the role of raising and distributing such funds—which was not the intent of the law—and have significantly expanded their use. Through an imaginative, and questionable, interpretation of the law, both parties now use soft money for congressional as well as Presidential campaigns. They use it as much as they can—and as much as they think they can get away with—for television advertising and get-out-the-vote drives. Their rationale is that they are using soft money for non-federal elections—for governorships, state legislatures, and so on. (The only federal election mentioned in the 1979 change in law was the one for President.) But, obviously, efforts to motivate people to vote the party ticket at the state level are likely to benefit the candidates for federal office as well. So the distinction is a false one, and the lengths to which the parties go to make the distinctions between their soft money and hard money expenditures are fairly ludicrous.[10]

Others, however, believe that Drew may be too harsh in her criticism and contend, in fact, that the amendments may potentially benefit state and local parties:

Critics such as Drew are too quick . . . to condemn all loopholes in FECA indiscriminately. They 1980 experience suggests that the law as written and administered may be open to abuse; certainly contributions to large voter-mobilization efforts on behalf of the national ticket should be subject to FECA's limits and disclosure requirements. But to regard the 1979 amendments simply as a loophole is to beg important questions: if private and party money have any role to play in Presidential elections, then one must ask through what channels that money is best raised and spent. The 1974 law, while providing an ancillary role for national party committees, clearly tended to remove state and local parties and their voter contact activities from the Presidential campaign. Assuming that some "loopholes" for party initiatives are desirable, the 1979 provisions seem, on balance, to be well conceived. They open up the possibility of a significant campaign role for state and local organizations and make the Presidential campaign a less centrally controlled media/dominated affair.[11]

In either case, the political issue of soft money recently became a legal issue when the Center for Responsive Politics filed a complaint with the FEC. Specifically, the group alleges that "the Republicans and Democrats illegally transferred funds to their respective state committees to influence the outcome of the special election to fill a U.S. Senate seat in November 1983 in Washington State."[12] The group bases its allegations on the fact that in 1983 the Democratic National Committee contributed $20,000 from its Non-Federal Corporate Account to the Washington State Democratic Central Committee while Republican national committees contributed a combined $67,000 to the Washington State Republican Party for "party-building" and other purposes. Only one statewide office—the U.S. Senate vacancy—was at stake in the election; the remainder of contests were local and primarily nonpartisan. According to the Center's Executive Director Ellen Miller:

It is hard for the Center to believe that the massive expenditures made by the national party committees were made to influence the outcome of a few races for county coroner (Spokane County), a county assessor, auditor, and sheriff (Whatcom County) or the city council (King and Snohomish Counties).[13]

As the foregoing suggests, current uses of the 1979 amendments are viewed alternatively as invidious on the one hand or invigorating on the other. The one claim probably awaits judicial consideration; the other time and additional research. At present, however, it does appear that amendments designed to enhance state and local parties may, at the same time (or perhaps instead), have further enhanced the fiscal position of their national counterparts.

CONCLUSION

As the accompanying article on "State Parties in the 1980s" illustrates, state political parties have become increasingly professional, financially sound, and better able to adapt to evolving political conditions. Nonetheless, state and local parties continue to face formidable obstacles and major challenges, including rapid technological changes and competition from organized interests.

Those parties also face legal challenges. To varying degrees, state laws regulate party structure, procedure, and electoral involvement. At the same time, federal law may be perceived as placing additional legal burdens on subnational party organizations. For instance, ACIR's survey of state party chairs found considerable dissatisfaction with FECA's reporting requirements and contribution limits.

If parties at all levels face competitive challenges in the forms of organized interests and PACs, subnational parties also face the challenge of maintaining their historical autonomy at a time when their national counterparts appear to be in financial and organizational ascendancy. That process, some contend, has been exacerbated by the Federal Election Campaign Act. By strengthening the financial bond between candidates and national party committees and encouraging state and local parties to defer to the fiscal and organizational superiority of their federal counterparts, some fear that the law has already contributed to unprecedented levels of party centralization. As one of the nation's leading scholars on campaign finance has noted:

[R]ecent changes in party organization are the result of both political reform (in this case the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, as amended) and changes in other areas . . . which were not directed toward the parties but are, nonetheless, having unintended consequences on party structure.[14]

Whether or not these "unintended consequences" will ultimately lead to a nationalization of campaign finance remains to be seen.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 114—RAILROAD RETIREMENT DAY

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor Senate Joint Resolution 114, designating August 29, 1985, as "Railroad Retirement Day." With this resolution, we join more than a million railroad retirees across the Nation in celebrating the success of the railroad retirement program on its 50th anniversary.

Throughout our Nation's history, railroads have played a major role in industrial development, employment, and national defense. In fact, America and its railroads grew up together. Today, railroads continue to function as the irreplaceable lifeline of our Nation. The railroad retirement system was established in 1935 to provide basic social insurance and a private pension for the industry's workers. For the past 50 years, the program has ably protected railroad workers, retirees, and their families against loss of income due to retirement, disability, or death.

On the occasion of this 50th anniversary, I think it would be helpful if we reviewed the history of the railroad retirement program and the reasons why it was established.

Private pension plans originated in the railroad industry in 1874 when the first formal industrial pension plan in America was established. By 1927, over 80 percent of all railroad employees worked for employers who had formal pension plans, but only a small proportion of employees ever received benefits. The pension plans paid inadequate benefits, had limited disability coverage, and no transferability from employer to employer. The plans were inadequately financed and could be terminated at will.

The Great Depression of the 1930's led to the push for retirement plans on a national basis because few of the Nation's elderly were covered under any type of retirement plan. The railroad industry pension plans had difficulty meeting their obligations during this period. Older workers exercised seniority rights to continue working, and accounted for a disproportionate number of the industry's employees. While the Social Security system was in the planning stages, railroad workers sought a separate railroad retirement system which would continue and broaden the existing railroad pension programs under a uniform national plan. The proposed Social Security system was not scheduled to begin monthly benefit payments for several years and would not give credit for work performed before 1937. Conditions in the railroad industry called for immediate benefit payments based on prior service.

Legislation was enacted in 1934, 1935, and 1937 to establish a railroad retirement system separate from the Social Security Program enacted in 1935. The 1934 act was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court and the 1935 act was also challenged in the courts. The future of the program was uncertain when the first benefit checks were mailed to 18 retirees on July 13, 1936. While an appeal was pending in the courts, railroad management and labor, at the urging of President Roosevelt, resolved their differences and this lead to the Railroad Retirement and Carriers' Taxing Acts of 1937. In 1937, the benefit payments of nearly 50,000 pensioners were taken over by the Railroad Retirement Board, and by the end of 1938, almost 100,000 elderly employees had retired under the system.

The largest check issued on that first day of benefit payments in 1936 was for $91.04 and went to Mr. Thomas B. Strain, age 73, of Johnson City, TN. I believe Mr. Strain's story demonstrates the importance of the railroad retirement system. Mr. Strain's railroad career began at age 15 with the Southern, and he served for several different railroad employers in a variety of positions before retiring in 1936 at age 73. He told Labor magazine in 1936:

I wasn't counting my chickens before they were hatched. In the light of what the courts have done to other liberal legislation, I scarcely dared hope that we would get our pensions for a long time, if ever. I have been living under suspense since I was retired. The $91.04 checks will lift a load of worry off my mind and make my future secure. The organziations which obtained this protection for old railroad men have done a great job, for which they are entitled to our prayers. I hope there will be no backing up now. (Labor, July 21, 1936.)

The first check, for $63.83, went to Mr. William Wesley Billett of Bellefonte, PA. Mr. Billett told the Labor reporter how important the pension was to him:

The people at Washington have made our dreams come true. I wish I could tell how grateful I am. Unless one is past 70, and separated from the activities of a lifetime, he cannot begin to understand what it means to be able to look to the future without fear. (Labor, July 21, 1936)

Since that July day in 1936, railroad retirement benefits of $77 billion have been paid to more than 4 million retired workers, their spouses and survivors. The first retirement annuities awarded under the 1935 act averaged $60 a month and no monthly benefits were payable to spouses or survivors. Currently, employee annuity awards average about $900 a month, annuities for spouses average just over $300 a month, and annuities to aged and disabled widow(er)s about $540 a month. In 1985, nearly 1 million beneficiaries will receive retirement and survivor benefits.

The program has been amended several times since 1935, and has faced solvency problems in recent years due to high inflation, recession, and a general decrease in railroad employment. The Railroad Retirement Solvency Act of 1983 was worked out by railroad labor, management, and Congress and was necessary to prevent a drastic 40-percent cut in retirement benefits. The bill had some tough medicine that required sacrifices from workers, employers, and retirees. But most importantly, the system is now financially sound and benefit payments are not jeopardized.

In my home State of Ohio, 53,400 railroad retirees and their families receive benefits. As a Senator, I hear from many railroad retirees about how important the program has been in ensuring an adequate retirement. Mr. Ralph Miller Graeff of Cleveland worked for the Railway Express and REA Express for 30 years. Although Mr. Graeff retired from the railroad in 1975, he has been working harder than ever as an officer with the National Association of Retired and Veteran Railway Employees in Cleveland. "The Railroad Retirement Act was a crucial piece of New Deal legislation, and has enabled millions of railroad workers to retire with a secure pension," Mr. Graeff told me. "But we have been worried in the past few years because of benefit cutbacks. I have been working against proposals to cut retirement benefits and eliminate the Railroad Retirement Board. I hope retirees can count on many more 50th anniversaries for the railroad retirement system, Mr. Graeff said.

Mr. President, this 50th anniversary occasion gives all of us the opportunity to renew our commitment to the railroad retirement system. It was established in a time of national crisis, and has faced financial crises and other challenges during the past five decades. Yet, the railroad retirement system continues to serve railroad employees and their families, providing protection against the economic hazards of old age, disability, unemployment, and sickness. I invite my colleagues to join me in supporting Senate Joint Resolution 114, to designate August 29, 1985, as "Railroad Retirement Day" and recognize one of the most important and successful social programs in our Nation's history.

NATIONAL HOME CARE WEEK

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, as the ranking Democratic member of the Special Committee on Aging, I am deeply aware of the importance of home health services in meeting the long-term care needs of older Americans. Since joining the committee, I have worked to develop home health care as an available and cost-effective option for those who would prefer to be cared for at home rather than in a nursing home or hospital. I am proud to join my colleagues in support of Senate Joint Resolution 139, designating the week of December 1, 1985, as "National Home Care Week."

If Congress approves this resolution, 1985 would be the fifth year that Congress has formally recognized the importance of home health care and the dedication of thousands of people across this country who provide these services. I have supported this resolution in the past. I believe that passage of this resolution is particularly significant in 1985 because home health services, which Congress has sought to make increasingly available to the elderly and disabled, seem to be targeted for severe reductions by the Reagan administration.

The implementation of the new Medicare prospective payment system, based on diagnosis related groups [DRG's], is reducing lengths of hospital stays. In response to a request from the Special Committee on Aging, the General Accounting Office [GAO] is examining the impact of DRG's on long-term care services. The GAO findings indicate that Medicare patients are being discharged earlier and often in need of further care. As a result, home health agencies are experiencing significantly increased demand for their services. Despite the increased demand, the Reagan administration is seeking a freeze on Medicare home health providers and is taking other steps to limit home health care.

In mid-May the Health Care Financing Administration [HCFA] announced a radical change in the methodology for calculating cost limits for home health reimbursement, effective July 1, 1985. HCFA gave just 30 days' notice for providers and the public to comment upon this complex and significant change. I led an effort to urge the Department of Health and Human Services to extend the comment period to allow time for adequate analyses and response to such dramatic changes. The Secretary ignored this effort and on July 5, issued a final notice instituting the new methodology, effective July 1, 1985.

These changes, combined with the freeze on provider reimbursement, will have a devastating effect on home health agencies and the clients they serve, especially Medicare beneficiaries and the indigent. Mr. President, I would like to read a few statements as examples of the many comments that I have received from home health agencies in my home State of Ohio.

In a letter I recently received from Sister Linda Smith, executive director of Mercy Home Health Care in Cincinnati, she writes "Without a sufficient reimbursement level, no agency will be able to afford these services for Medicare recipients. What will happen is that home care will belong to those who can afford the services—leaving the indigent and the elderly in hospitals or nursing homes * * *"

The director of the Visiting Nurses Association in Dayton, Mr. Gregory J. Rozelle, said that if the new methodology had been used in 1984, his agency would have lost over $30,000. Mr. Rozelle points out that as a result of the DRG's "Home health agencies have had to provide longer visits and more intensive services to these patients. As a result, costs are rising. The proposed method of limiting payment would seem to single out home health agencies for cost containment when in fact they are facing extraordinary pressure and are inherently cost effective."

I agree with these comments and the many others I have received. Therefore, I have joined Senator JOHN HEINZ in cosponsoring S. 1450 which would prohibit the Secretary from changing home health care reimbursement levels or methodologies from the June 30, 1985, levels until October 1, 1986, or during a freeze period on home health reimbursement, whichever is longer. Unfortunately, the Secretary and HCFA have decided to make policy for home health care rather than implementing policy set by Congress, thus making S. 1450 necessary.

S. 778, the "Home Care Protection Act of 1985," which I am cosponsoring, is aimed at ensuring fairness for home health providers and the Americans they serve. S. 778 would clarify Congress' intent regarding the intermittent care standard for home health coverage. The fiscal intermediaries, under pressure from HCFA, are frequently interpreting the standard more narrowly than Congress intended in establishing the Medicare benefit for home health care. Furthermore, this standard is applied inconsistently across the country.

Earlier this year HCFA issued proposed new rules which will make it more difficult for States to receive waivers to provide home and community-based services under Medicaid. In fact, it is likely that many States will not even seek waivers under these rules because they are so restrictive, representing another attempt by the administration to reduce the availability of home and community-based long-term care services for the elderly and the poor. I have joined Senators BRADLEY and CHILES in introducing S. 1277, the "Medicaid Home and Community-Based Services Improvement Act of 1985," which would allow the States the choice of providing home and community based services, including home health care, as part of their State Medicaid plan, without first seeking a waiver from HCFA.

The administration has taken other steps as part of what appears to be a concerted strategy to reduce older Americans' access to home health services. Among these, I would like to cite two more examples: their proposal to impose a copayment on the Medicare home health benefit and their proposal to remove the Medicare waiver of liability presumption. It is encouraging to note, however, that thousands of dedicated people are continuing to provide home and other community-based, long-term care services to their clients despite these major roadblocks.

By supporting "National Home Care Week" and other Senate efforts to ensure the availability of home care services as a viable and humane option for ill and frail older Americans, we recognize the resourcefulness and commitment of those individuals who serve our Nation's elderly and disabled. At a time when Government and taxpayers alike seek ways to contain costs while providing health care with dignity, then home health care and other community based health services such as hospice, seem to me to be natural choices. I urge passage of this resolution, as well as Senate Joint Resolution 155 which would designate November 1985 as "National Hospice Month." By this action, we will not only honor those who provide home care services but will send another message to the administration about Congress' belief in home care as a cost-effective and humane option for America's elderly.

WRIGHT-PATTERSON AFB POW/MIA MEMORIAL SERVICE

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, no American family should be forced to live in the agonizing twilight between hope and despair, and I know I speak for every citizen of this land when I say we must do everything humanly possible to see that every last American soldier, sailor, marine, and airman who served in Southeast Asia is finally, fully, and completely accounted for. On this issue there can be no compromise.

On July 15, a memorial service was held at Wright-Patterson Air Force Base in Ohio to honor our POW/MIA servicemen and their families. The base chaplain, Maj. Howard V. Mellott, delivered a moving sermon which called upon the national conscience to keep faith with our POW/MIA families, to stand with them and support them in their hour of need. I believe that Chaplain Mellott's message is significant not only for those present at the July 15 ceremony but for the Nation as a whole. Thus I ask unanimous consent that the full text of his remarks be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the text was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POW/MIA SERVICE OF RECOGNITION AND REMEMBRANCE

(By Chaplain, Maj. Howard V. Mellott)

No word, no prayers can adequately be spoken today that would give you the hope and the promise that you so much desire, the whereabouts, information that you have so desperately craved for and needed, since the end of the Vietnam conflict. But we are here today to show you in this small, but meaningful way that we do recognize and remember your husbands, your fathers, your brothers that are still missing in action or who are prisoners of war.

At a funeral a few weeks ago, I referred to the four Marines slain in El Salvador as the "Sons of America," and that I truly believe they were, for we were all caught up in the events of that tragedy. That being the feeling then, I think I can truthfuly say that these POWs—these MIAs whom we are remembering today are "the fathers and the brothers of America!" I served with some of them during the Vietnam conflict and many who are here today served with them too. Among the many who are still POWs and MIAs there is a Vice Commander from Nakon Phonom, Thailand who is among our POWs and MIAs. I met the Vice Commander on my way to my isolated tour at Nakon Phonom. He was returning from a visit with his wife and two small daughters (twins). That was April 1968. On the plane he showed me the family picture. In June of that year he left the base for a mission on Laos: A mission from which he did not return. Now his twin daughters, I'm sure are in their early twenties. They and their mother are still awaiting some kind of word as to what really happened to him! I cannot forget him nor will I ever forget him. Nor can we afford to forget any of our POWs or MIAs now!

Captain Gerald Coffee, United States Navy, a POW for seven years spoke this past May in the Garden Grove Crystal Cathedral where Dr. Bob Schuller is the Pastor. Captain Coffee emphasized the importance of faith and gave four aspects of their faith. A faith in themselves as individuals, a faith in each other, a faith in their country, and a faith in God. He related how he, along with other prisoners during that time of imprisonment, tapped out codes on the prison cell walls to encourage each other. There were the letters "G B" meaning "God Bless, be tough, hang in there, I'm praying for you." "G N"—"Good night". "G B A"—"God Bless America". There was also a code signal for church services each Sunday. Gathered at their respective cell walls they would repeat the Pledge of Allegiance, The Lord's Prayer, and the 23rd Psalm and other Bible passages they remembered from church and Sunday school. They even passed a bit of humor around for their cheer: "Little weevil in my bread, I think I just bit off your head!"

These men to whom we pay honor are military people, recognized for their duty and their devotion: They are men who fulfilled their obligation of honor to their country, America: They are men who obeyed the Military Code of Conduct, resisted exploitation, even at the cost of severe torture, they are still there—we cannot and must not forget them!

Our message today to our POWs and MIAs, especially to the families, is to not give up. Hold on! If you can force your heart and nerve and sinew to serve their term long after they are gone, the captors, when there's nothing left within you, accept the will that says to hold on! Hold on!

In Exodus, Chapter 17, beginning at Verse Eight, the children of Israel were attacked by the Amalekites. Moses stood at the top of the hill with the Rod of God in his hands. The Bible tells us that as long as Moses held up the rod in his hands, Israel was winning the battle. But whenever he rested his arms at his side, the Amalekites were winning. It was too much for Moses to continually hold up his arms with the Rod of God in his hands. Consequently, Aaron and Hur saw Moses' dilemma. They rolled a stone for Moses to sit upon and they stood on each side holding up his arms. The battle was then won when Moses' hands were strengthened by Aaron and Hur on each side of him holding his arms up so that he could hold high the Rod of God.

I say to the families of our POWs and MIAs that too often we have been guilty of letting you hold on to hope and faith by yourselves while we have stood over at a distance. We stood away from you, not because we wanted to, but because we did not understand. You have weakened, almost at times ready to give up. Experience has taught us that no one can stand alone, especially in the last few weeks has this been brought close to home to each of us. Please be assured you are not standing alone any longer. We are here to stand with you. We will stand on either side of you, as did Aaron and Hur with Moses. We will stand in front of you, in back of you, and all around you to hold you up, to encourage you, to go with you, if needs be, all the way until there are answers and results to your questions concerning your husbands, your fathers and your brothers. Our fathers and brothers too.

(Selected by Chaplain Mellott)

A BLESSED THOUGHT

There is promise in each sunrise,
There is hope for each new day;
There's a sunbeam for each raindrop,
There is help along the way.
There is grace for all life's problems,
There is strength for trials you face;
There is mercy and compassion
Even in life's darkest place.
There is love that can't be measured,
That makes all life's sorrows dim
When you place your hand in God's hand
And walk life's path with Him.

POLISH-AMERICAN HERITAGE MONTH

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, today marks the first day of Polish-American Heritage Month. I am proud that the Senate, mindful of the many contributions of Polish-Americans, has set aside this time to recognize the achievements and culture of ethnic Poles.

Although for many years Poland has been ruled by the iron hand of autocracy and despotism, in 1791 and for 20 years thereafter, Poland enjoyed a brief period of freedom and democratic government under a constitution patterened after our own. In the early 20th century, Poles came to America seeking relief from an oppressive Prussian regime and from shortages of farmland in Europe. To many during this period, the New World embodied the promise of economic prosperity and democratic liberties. In Ohio, the Polish community flourished. Poles were drawn to the port city of Cleveland with the expectation that employment awaited them in the prosperous iron and steel mills of America's industrial heartland. As their numbers increased, Polish settlers in Ohio established a town of considerable vitality know as Warszawa or Little Warsaw. This community became a stronghold of Polish culture in northeastern Ohio, second only to Chicago in the Midwest.

Ohio Poles did not escape the stagnation and austerity of the Great Depression. Emigration from Europe declined during this period, while the Poles in Ohio strove to retain the advances they had made during the preceding years of prosperity. World War II and an increase in demand for the products of an industrial economy brought renewed vigor to the Nation and to the Polish community. Hitler's ruthless invasion of Poland and his persecution of the valiant Polish resistance prompted many Poles to join the American war effort to fight Nazi tyranny. Today, the Polish Legion of American Veterans, with who I have visited on several holiday occasions, and the Polish veterans of World War I and II, remember the sacrifices of the more than 1 million ethnic Poles who served in the American and Allied Armed Forces during World War II, in World War I, in Korea, and in Vietnam. There are no more loyal and patriotic U.S. citizens than those Americans of Polish extraction.

Like most American cities during the 1950's and 1960's, Cleveland became suburbanized. Similarly, second and third generation Poles moved from the security and homogeneity of Polish communities like Warszawa into the sprawling suburbs of modern America.

Today, in a community where Sunday Mass is still said in Polish and where tour buses bring visitors to the Slavic Harvest Festival every fall, Polish culture is undergoing a renaissance. Indeed, a June 1982 issue of the Ohio magazine reports that,

> In the melting pot of Cleveland, where assimilation and upward mobility have wiped out most of the ethnic strongholds and left them cheerless and transient, Warszawa is different. Here the Poles, and to a lesser degree the Bohemians, have stayed. An urban village. Self-contained. Self-sufficient. * * * They see in their customs something worth hanging on to, in their neighborhood a vitality worth keeping. * * * Let the rest of the world change, they say in Warszawa, we'll wait and see.

Finally, Mr. President, as we recognize the many contributions made by Polish-Americans and as we honor their heritage, let us also celebrate the confluence of ethnic traditions which combine to form a society that is uniquely American.

FORTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE UNITED NATIONS

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, as one who was present at the San Francisco Conference as part of the secretarial staff, I am intimately acquainted with the original goals and aspirations of the United Nations. The ideals embraced by the U.N. are similar to those which guide our country—to replace a world at war with one where the rule of law shall prevail; where human rights are honored; where development will blossom; and where conflict gives way to freedom from violence. After 40 years, these ideals still live within the United Nations.

Many in the United States criticize the United Nations and question U.S. membership and contributions to the U.N. family of organizations. It is clear that the United Nations could be a more effective organization but it is my firm belief that it still plays a vitally important role in preserving and promoting international peace and security, international development, and human rights. To date no one has been able to identify a better way to approach problems in these areas on a world scale.

Every administration since the founding of the United Nations has determined that U.S. membership is essential to our national interests and that the United States should play an active role in the various U.N. organizations as an important part of our overall program of diplomacy. Thoughtful people consistently agree that the U.N. system provides a means to accomplish important tasks that neither the United States nor other nations can achieve alone or in small coalitions.

Therefore, Mr. President, it is with great pleasure that I ask unanimous consent that the remarks of Elliot L. Richardson at the annual meeting of the National Capital United Nations Association delivered on June 6, 1985, be printed in the RECORD. Ambassador Richardson, an old friend, has an unrivaled record of distinction in the service of the United States. He has served as Deputy Secretary of State, Secretary of Commerce, Secretary of Defense, Attorney General, and Ambassador to the U.N. Conference on the Law of the Sea.

It is with great pleasure that I insert his enlightened remarks into the RECORD.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS BY ELLIOT L. RICHARDSON

It is a great pleasure to join my fellow members of the United Nations Association in honoring the distinguished individuals here tonight who were present at the creation of the United Nations in San Francisco forty years ago. The high hopes kindled there may no longer burn so brightly, but they are still at the heart of the aspiration for peace.

I'm sure you will have noted that the program bills my remarks as an "address." After the buildup Ambassador Leonard gave me, an "address" is an intimidating assignment, and the only thing I can promise is length. So I urge you to sit back, settle down, and be prepared for a long oration. If it turns out to be shorter than you anticipated, please conceal your disappointment.

I join the veterans of San Francisco this evening in commemorating, in addition to the birth of the United Nations, two other closely related anniversaries. The Normandy invasion began forty-one years ago today; VE-Day came just over forty years ago. I was in the D-Day landing, and I celebrated V-E Day in Germany. In the circumstances, I hope you will tolerate a story about a couple of hunters in the Maine woods. It was a warm, late September day. The hunters had bagged a huge buck with a tremendous spread of antlers. They were dragging the buck by the forefeet, and the antlers kept catching on the underbrush. As they toiled, the hunters were passed by a brisk young female hiker. She noticed what a hard time they were having and said, "I hope you guys won't mind a suggestion, but the way the antlers are curved, it looks like they wouldn't catch so much if you dragged the deer by the hind legs."

The two hunters thanked her and decided that maybe she was right. So they dragged the stag by the hind legs for a while. It was a hot day, and when the time came for a breather, one hunter said to the other, "You know, that wasn't a bad idea that young woman gave us. It really is easier this way." The second hunter replied, "Yeah, that's true. The only trouble is we're getting farther and farther from the automobile."

I'm sure you're right, Ambassador Leonard, in saying that there has been no fundamental change in the spirit of idealism with which the UN was launched, and no change in the basic commitment to the cause of peace that emerged from World War II. It seems plain, nevertheless, that we have been getting farther and farther from the automobile.

In addition to landing in Normandy on D-Day, my regiment was selected for the privilege of being the first American unit to enter Paris. On the evening of August 24, 1944, our camp in the Bois de Vincennes was surrounded by an eager and curious crowd of Parisians. One woman asked me, "When you defeat the Germans, will you go on across Germany and attack the Soviet Army?" I was shocked and incredulous. The same question, nevertheless, kept cropping up as we crossed France and advanced into Belgium and Germany. I developed a stock reply. "That would be insane," I would say. "Why should we? We have no quarrel with Russia. Our two countries have ample resources and ample territory. Each has energetic, talented people. Each has enough internal problems to keep it busy. Just because the Russians have a different ideology from ours is no reason to go to war with them."

I still think this was a sensible, rational answer. It was the sort of answer you would expect from a well-brought-up American boy. Whatever we were, we young American soldiers were not cynics. Neither were we smart enough to foresee the mixture of Soviet truculence and paranoia that, within a few years, would trigger the Cold War. The West had no choice but to respond, of course, but that is small consolation for the cycle of action and reaction that has shadowed the global scene ever since. Meanwhile, the very existence of the Cold War continues to stand between the ideals on which the UN was founded and the possibility of their fulfillment.

A second reason why we have been getting farther and farther from the automobile, I think, is that people have simply gotten weary of the effort to keep old expectations alive. Although our native idealism occasionally reemerges in a new enthusiasm—the nuclear freeze movement, for instance—the American public has become bored by the UN and all its progeny. Someday, incidentally, I'm going to take a little time off and write an essay on the historical consequences of boredom. It will argue that boredom has been the single most important cause of war. We are told that "Man (woman) does not live by bread alone." Does this mean that we do not easily endure contentment?

However that may be, the decades since the founding of the UN have again and again confronted us with problems that turned out to be a lot harder than they originally seemed. Take conflict prevention and peacekeeping. If wars are endemic to relations among tribes, sovereign states, and ethnic groups, it was to have been expected that it would be difficult to develop the means of preventing and containing them.

What is new under the sun is the awesome reality that any given conflict could lead to a nuclear exchange, and a nuclear exchange could lead, via "nuclear winter," to the extinction of all life on earth. Nothing could be clearer, therefore, than that humanity has far more compelling reason than ever before to work out better means of conflict prevention and better means of conflict containment and peacekeeping. And yet, because the effort has been so difficult and because the successes have been so debatable, we have tended to throw up our hands and turn aside.

Surely any rational outline of a coherent system of foreign policy would have as one of its major headings "Management of the Politico-Military Balance." Arms control and disarmament would come under this heading. A second heading would be "International Economic Relations—Economic Development, Money, and Trade." A third heading, I submit—and I think many of you would agree—should be "Human Rights." Hubert Humphrey, whose sister Frances Howard is here tonight, would certainly have insisted that this belongs in the outline.

Only one other subject is of comparable importance: "Dispute Settlement, Conflict Prevention, Conflict Containment, and Peacekeeping." In fact, it is not a major plank in any country's foreign policy today. Now this may be a consequence partly of the sheer failure of imagination. It may be a consequence partly of emotional resistance to facing up to the implications of nuclear winter. It is also, surely, a symptom of "tired blood."

Another factor taking us farther and farther from the automobile is our reaction to the perception that the United Nations is just another bureaucracy. One answer to that is, "So? What large-scale human institution is not?" Now that I'm in the private sector, I'm chronically irked and amused by the tendency of private-sector managers to look toward governmental institutions, domestic or international, as if their bureaucratic behavior were somehow peculiar. The truth, of course, is that private enterprises like the steel and railroad industries have been among the most constipated bureaucracies the world has ever seen. It is, nevertheless, a fact that the perception of the management of the United Nations and its affiliated organizations as bloated and unwieldly has affected people's attitudes toward them.

Given, then, this diagnosis of the problem, it is obvious that I wouldn't be Chairman of the United Nations Association if I did not believe that there are some answers and if I were not convinced that it is important to resist these trends. The UNA is fighting against the three negative factors that I have just briefly outlined. The UNA is fighting for a stronger system of conflict prevention and peacekeeping. We few, we happy few, we band of sisters and brothers who belong to the UNA, rightly take pride in being a part of this effort. Ours is the only membership organization attempting to wrestle with these problems. Not only are we doing so with some success, but the momentum we are now developing will make us increasingly effective. We need, however, to do much more to enlist the help of others.

Take, for example, the deterioration of relations between the Soviet Union and the United States which has done so much to prevent the UN Security Council from fulfilling its promise. For 15 years, persistently, year in and year out, the United Nations Association has maintained exchanges with the Soviet Union directed toward both economic and security issues. This is our so-called "Parallel Studies Program." When I became chairman of the UNA-USA, the program had long been headed by my predecessor, former UN Ambassador Bill Scranton; it is now headed by former Ambassador to the Soviet Union and former Deputy Secretary of State Walter Stoessel. Alternating between the Soviet Union and the United States, meetings are held two or three times a year. Former Under Secretary of the Treasury Bob Roosa chaired the U.S. side at a recent discussion of economic issues in Moscow, and in New York earlier this year Ambassador Stoessel chaired a session on security issues in which former National Security Adviser Brent Scrowcroft participated.

These exchanges do not produce dramatic results, but they do significantly contribute to the development of better understanding of the issues that divide us. Foundations have been laid in the thinking of a great many people in key positions. The proof of the pudding will come whenever the political will exists at the highest levels to achieve progress toward a more rational relationship between our two countries.

Under the second heading—peacekeeping, conflict prevention, dispute settlement, and containment of the escalation of conflict—the UNA is the only membership organization resisting the "tired blood" syndrome. The Multilateral Issues Project for 1985 focused on these problems. Fifty of our own chapters, together with groups from the League of Women Voters and other organizations, grappled with them. The are hard problems, and when you read the report—it will be released next month—don't be disappointed because it doesn't advocate dramatic new departures. Our recommendations will be thoughtful; they will also be realistic. The subject will in any case be on the UNA-USA agenda for as long as it takes to find solutions. Given the 40 years in which these questions have been awaiting adequate answers, not even we, not even the UNA, should be expected to produce them in only one year.

The most important thing about the Multilateral Issues Project is that we the people, members of the UNA-USA, are tackling matters of genuinely vital concern. A week ago in Los Angeles, in an American Association for the Advancement of Sciences panel on nuclear nonproliferation, I summarized the recommendations contained in last year's UNA report on this subject. It's a first-rate report. No "think tank" could do better. We are already working to put its recommendations into effect; these too will remain on the UNA agenda for as long as it takes to get them adopted. But the report did not come from a think tank. It emerged from the hard thinking of UNA members all across the country. This is the aim of the Multilateral Issues Project—to involve individual citizens in finding better ways of assuring their own survival. That is what gives the report its special significance.

Finally, there is that matter of bureaucracy I touched on. The UNA has just launched a new project on the management and administration of the UN. Here again we are tackling, head-on, a problem that has sapped confidence in the UN system. In terms of its potential contribution to the rebuilding of public confidence in the UN, this could be one of the UNA's most valuable initiatives. With the help of a preliminary grant from the Ford Foundation, we brought together last spring a group drawn from a number of the permanent missions in New York as well as from the U.S. government and the UN secretariat. Speaking as a pretty experienced bureaucrat myself, I have been greatly impressed by the seriousness and objectivity of their deliberations.

Happily, we now have in Javier Pérez de Cuellar a Secretary-General who welcomes a searching examination of the way the UN manages its affairs. Although he was prevented by a critical development in the Iran-Iraq situation from attending a meeting on the subject in which he had planned to participate, we did discuss it with his principal advisers and were assured of their cooperation. With adequate follow-on financial support, this is another area in which the UNA can make a major contribution.

In general, and in the broadest terms, the gap between UN potential and UN performance is in part a consequence of a failure of U.S. leadership itself. This country's practice, I am sorry to say—and this is not a comment aimed only at the present administration—has been to measure our success at the UN solely in terms of our ability to defeat votes critical of ourselves and our friends. We have not kept score on the basis of our success in carrying out the U.S. agenda because we have not had an agenda.

This state of affairs should be remedied. The United States should be taking the initiative, not simply reacting to the initiatives of others. As the nation with the largest stake in the preservation of global stability, whatever strengthens world order is in our interest. Whatever strengthens the UN, therefore, is in our interest. And the way to strengthen the UN is to use it.

If you want to build a stronger structure of peace and stability in the world, you do not, as in the Malvinas-Falklands crisis, rush into an exercise in shuttle diplomacy and call on the UN Secretary-General to use his good offices only after the exercise has failed. You do not dispatch a great-power expedition to Lebanon and then, when the foreseeable reaction has forced its withdrawal, think belatedly of substituting a UN peacekeeping force. You do not act unilaterally in Nicaragua without first having exhausted the effort to build a structure based on Article 52 of the UN Charter under which the countries of the region commit themselves to resist Soviet/Cuban intervention.

The U.S. has the unique capacity—and the corresponding responsibility—to take the lead in creating a world order in which individual human beings are enabled to live their lives as free as possible from the threats of war and famine and oppression. Having failed to make clear how we propose to address these problems, the United States has no solid basis for criticizing the shortcomings of the UN. We owe it to ourselves—we owe it to the community of nations—to go before the UN with clearcut proposals for countering these threats. We owe it to ourselves—we owe it to the community of nations—to fight for these proposals. We owe it to ourselves—we owe it to the community of nations—to do our utmost to win the understanding and support of our critics and opponents.

You, the members of the Capital Area Division of the UNA-USA, and especially those of you who have been honored here tonight, have long been doing your part to support and defend the purposes of the UN. You deserve to take enduring satisfaction in the contributions you have made. I hope you will feel inspired to do even more in the years ahead.

Thank you very much.

A TRIBUTE TO ADM. HENRY E. ECCLES

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, the U.S. Navy has a long and proud tradition of producing from its ranks not only courageous and enterprising warriors, but also thoughtful, brilliant, and eloquent analysts and theoreticians who develop strategic and tactical concepts that ultimately shape our Nation's Naval forces.

Some of the outstanding examples of the U.S. Navy's great intellectuals have been Stephen B. Luce, Alfred Thayer Mahan, and William S. Sims.

I pay tribute today to a retired Naval officer who stands in the forefront of that great tradition, Rear Adm. (Ret.) Henry E. Eccles. Admiral Eccles, a graduate in 1922 from the U.S. Naval Academy, served on active duty in the Navy with great distinction for 30 years. His active duty service included 12 years of submarine duty and service on destroyers, cruisers, and battleships. Assigned to the Asiatic Fleet at the outbreak of World War II, he saw combat duty as a vessel commander, and then was deeply involved in the complex problems of base development and logistics planning and operations for campaigns in the Pacific.

Admiral Eccles was awarded, in recognition of his service in those years the Navy Cross, the Silver Star, the Legion of Merit, and the Netherlands Order of the Bronze Cross, before his retirement from active duty in 1952.

Perhaps more importantly, however, his service and experience in active duty provided the basis for his extraordinary contributions to theoretical and strategic thinking in all of the many years since his retirement.

As with Luce, Mahan and Sims, Admiral Eccles has produced his influential books, essays, and lectures in Newport, RI., where he has been closely associated with the Naval War College as a confident and advisor to War College presidents, as a lecturer, author, and conductor of seminars.

Admiral Eccles is best known as the Navy's earliest and most persuasive and influential exponent of the science of military logistics. While still on active duty, he established the Logistics Department at the Naval War College, and pursued the same subject after his retirement.

His understanding of the importance of logistics in warfare has led Admiral Eccles to perceptive analyses of the strong links of interdependence between a nation's defense capabilities and the strength and capacity of its private-sector economy, and between military strength and effectiveness and foreign policy and diplomacy. And his forceful and energetic presentation of his views has made him one of the most influential of the strategic thinkers of this century.

Through the years, I have myself frequently had the benefit of Admiral Eccles intelligent, perceptive and informed analyses of our Nation's military and political position in the world and I have always found it original, provocative, and highly useful.

Recently illness has caused Admiral Eccles to leave his home of many years in my home city of Newport, RI. We miss him mightily as a neighbor, but continue to look for his continued contributions to the theoretical structure which must underlie effective national defense.

THE URGENCY OF A COMPREHENSIVE BAN ON NUCLEAR EXPLOSIONS

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, earlier today, I and a number of my colleagues recalled the devastation of Hiroshima 40 years ago by the first atomic weapon used as an instrument of war. That recollection made some of us acutely aware of how much remains to be done if we are ever to get nuclear weapons truly under control.

This past week brought us stark evidence of the sorry plight of nuclear arms control as both the Soviet Union and the United States handled the test ban issue so capriciously.

Unfortunately, the way the offers and the rejections were made by both sides left the impression that the superpowers are still engaged in "grandstanding" about serious arms control issues. It would be most reassuring if each side were willing to take a fresh look at the offer of the other side and weigh it carefully before reacting. I hope they do not consider the matter closed.

In regard to the Soviet offer, I recognize that there are pitfalls to be avoided. We would need to be sure that verification was adequate, and we would have to ensure that a moratorium was not allowed to substitute for what should be the goal of both sides—a mutual and verifiable ban on nuclear explosions. Nonetheless, I believe that we should look upon the Soviet offer as an indication that they are seriously interested in sitting down at the negotiating table to see if agreement is possible on a test ban. We should not allow the opportunity to be lost.

Mr. President, there is no question in my mind that a mutual and verifiable ban on nuclear explosions is very much in the national interest of the United States. Unfortunately, the administration decided early in its first term to abandon the longstanding U.S. quest for a comprehensive ban on explosions. The administration also decided that it would not support Senate approval of two yet-unratified testing agreements—the Threshold Test Ban Treaty of 1974 and the Peaceful Nuclear Explosions Treaty of 1976. Both treaties were concluded by Republican Presidents and have received bipartisan support. For more than 2 years, the United States has sought expanded verification provisions in the two treaties, which already include unprecedented verification, and the Soviets have said ratification must precede talks on additional verification measures. The result is an impasse that continues to this day without any good prospect of resolution.

Unless some way is found to regain momentum, we could pay a very high price. A total of 124 nonnuclear weapons States have forsworn nuclear weapons in the Non-Proliferation Treaty based on a pledge of the nuclear weapons States that they would strive to bring an end to testing. Those nations will gather in September for the 5-year review of the treaty. We and the Soviets have scant little to tell them about our efforts to put an end to testing. Can anyone doubt that a decision by other nations that the superpowers are not doing anything and that they should get their own nuclear weapons would very quickly place the world in far greater jeopardy?

Mr. President, if we want progress, I believe that we should agree with the Soviets to begin negotiations at the earliest possible time. In those negotiations, we should explore all feasible avenues toward successful verification, including the exchange of inspection teams.

I do not believe that a mutual moratorium of reasonable duration would adversely affect our national security. Our ability to detect and measure testing has improved substantially in recent years. In addition, we could seek early exchanges of data and agreement upon other reasonable steps to enhance verification and reassure the sides during a moratorium.

Mr. President, some abhor the thought of a moratorium on nuclear testing simply because the Soviets have proposed it. I sometimes think that the Soviets should be urged to have only bad ideas, since Soviet support can taint a good idea, particularly in the field of arms control. Nonetheless, I believe that we should not reject a moratorium out of hand. It would be far more sensible to put the Soviets to the test of working with us to fashion a moratorium of a duration consistent with our national security interests. Such a moratorium must, of course, be mutual and must be adequately verifiable, consistent with our needs during its duration.

In this connection, I should note that many believe that the Soviets broke the terms of a testing moratorium before agreement was reached on the Limited Test Ban Treaty of 1963. On this basis, some argue that a moratorium shouldn't be attempted again. This judgment is based on a fundamental misreading of the facts. We, the British, and the Soviets agreed in October 1958, to suspend testing while test ban negotiations were pursued. In December 1959, we announced that we were ending our formal moratorium, thus releasing the others from their obligation to us. We and the Soviets began preparing for tests. The Soviets resumed atmospheric testing on September 1, 1961, and we resumed underground testing 2 weeks later. We were quite surprised by the magnitude of the Soviet testing program, but had no reason to believe that they were bound not to resume nuclear testing. The record thus demonstrates that the Soviets adhered to the only testing moratorium to date, rather than the reverse.

Most importantly, whether there were a moratorium or not, we should resume negotiations on a comprehensive ban started in the previous administration. Those negotiations were very productive. By 1979, almost all issues had been resolved or appeared resolvable. The sides were moving toward agreement that tests would be stopped in a treaty, that a moratorium would be placed indefinitely on so-called peaceful nuclear explosions, that national seismic stations would be placed by the United States and the Soviets on each other's territory and that there would be a system of challenge inspections.

Mr. President, it has been so long since we have gotten anywhere in arms control that I sometimes think we have forgotten the vital contribution arms limitation can make to our national security. There is no question in my mind that it would be tragic if we were to abandon our goal of a test ban. I believe we can achieve a test ban if both sides are willing. It is an opportunity waiting to be grasped. We would be wise to recall the example of President Kennedy, who, in 1963, seized upon an opportunity and, within a matter of weeks, concluded agreement on the first testing treaty. Fortunately, it is not too late for us to show similar wisdom and to conclude the effort he started.

TRIBUTE TO EDWIN CRAIG WALL, SR.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise today to pay tribute to a distinguished entrepreneur and philanthropist from South Carolina, Edwin Craig Wall, Sr., who died April 8, 1985. To his wife, May Wall; his son, E. Craig Wall, Jr., and his three daughters, Harriet Martin, May Wall, and Nell Otto, and indeed the entire Wall family, I extend my deepest sympathy.

Edwin Craig Wall, Sr., was born on February 14, 1911, in Lilesville, NC. He graduated from Lilesville High School with the class of 1928. Though he never earned a college degree, he was an example of the reality of the American dream. Coming out of a rural southern town paralyzed by the depression, he began a lumber business in Conway, SC, that grew rapidly and provided jobs for many citizens and economic growth for South Carolina.

Wall was a resourceful businessman. His company, Canal Industries, Inc., expanded in new areas and turned waste lumber into tomato stakes and step ladders, bark and sawdust into charcoal briquets, and fumes from his machinery into lumber-drying steam.

Through Canal Industries and its affiliated entities, Mr. Wall became involved in land development, management, and retailing. By financing other business ventures, he played a major role in the development of the "Grand Strand" along the South Carolina coast. One of his best known investments was Waccamaw Pottery, a huge outlet mall that has attracted millions of tourist dollars to the coastal area of the State, again providing much needed jobs and economic stability.

Craig Wall was not only an entrepreneur, but was a public servant as well. A registered forester and a pioneer in conservation work, he was long active in forestry organizations on the county, State, and national levels. For his community service, he was honored with the American Legion Outstanding Community Service Award in 1971 and the Boy Scouts' coveted Silver Beaver Award in 1960. He served on the board of directors of Conway Hospital and was trustee of the Belle Baruch Foundation in Georgetown, SC.

In the business community, he was director of the Peoples National Bank in Conway, SC, and served on the general board of directors for the C&S National Bank of South Carolina. He held a seat on the Federal Reserve Board of Richmond from 1972 to 1978.

Mr. Wall's interest in higher education reached across the Carolinas. He served on the board of visitors for Davidson College in North Carolina, Clemson University, and Presbyterian College in South Carolina, and was on the board of trustees at Queens College in Charlotte, NC. He was instrumental in the founding of the Coastal Carolina branch of the University of South Carolina. From 1967 to 1971 he was chairman of the South Carolina Higher Education Commission.

Mr. President, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues the outstanding accomplishments of this man, since he is a typical example of one who has succeeded in realizing the opportunities that America offers and who has rendered great service to humanity.

CRISIS FACING AMERICA'S TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, there is a growing crisis facing America's textile industry. With each week that passes, the flood of cheap imports grows enormously. The American textile/fiber/apparel market is literally being buried under a tidal wave of unfairly subsidized products against which high quality American products cannot compete.

America has a long and proven history of innovation and the ability to not only withstand competition, but to successfully compete in its own right. Not long ago, I introduced S. 680, a bill which would make major strides in saving America's textile industry if passed. For a long time I did not introduce this legislation in the hopes that a commitment made to me in 1980 by President Reagan would be realized. I feel certain the President is a man of his word. However, I believe his advisors have failed to present him with a true picture of the devastation which is threatening to obliterate our textile industry within the next decade. In my continuing effort to provide an accurate description of the industry and its rapid deterioration, I have been submitting a series of articles for the record so that my colleagues can read this for themselves.

Mr. President, the textile industry is becoming an endangered species. If present import levels are not reduced, by 1995 there will be no more textile industry. This sad tale of unfair foreign competition is revealed in this article from the Florence, SC, Morning News on Thursday, July 18, 1985, which I ask unanimous consent be printed in the RECORD for consideration by my colleagues.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IMPORTS A "KILLER" FOR U.S. TEXTILE INDUSTRY

CAMDEN.—Sam the Detective discovered what was killing Dolly's dress sales: imports.

A humorous skit presented Wednesday by the S.C. Textile Manufacturers Association brought home the message that American-made goods mean more jobs and greater buying power for Americans. When Dolly began purchasing foreign-made dresses because they were cheaper, a local dress plant closed. Workers were laid off, so they had no money with which to shop.

Sam, who was really an out-of-work economics professor, pointed out the domino theory applies to business. If one is affected, the whole country is ultimately involved.

The textile association is promoting a program they hope will make the public more aware of American-made products. "Crafted With Pride in the U.S.A." will soon be seen on a lot more items, such as textiles and clothing.

The group sponsored a breakfast presentation for retail merchants and the media.

Its purpose was to promote a nationwide campaign to recognize American goods.

Dick Demarest, plant manager of the DuPont May Plant, said the association is trying to save American textiles. "The textile industry has been seriously damaged by imports. In 1984, imports increased by 34 percent," he said.

To bring the figures closer to home, he told the group that 18 textile and apparel plants in South Carolina closed last year. that meant 5,400 employees were laid off.

"The economy of the United States is hurt by imports," he said, noting there are 2 million textile-related jobs in the country. The group is not opposed to imports, but it was opposed to "the outrageous growth of imports in the past three of four years," he said.

American consumers prefer articles made in this country, he said. The Crafted With Pride program was initiated to make consumers aware of the need to purchase U.S. goods.

"The U.S. textile industry is the most productive in the world. It can be the most competitive if we are allowed free trade." Demarest explained that the textile association is pushing for legislation to control the amount of imports allowed in this country.

"We are asking the merchants of South Carolina to support us in the Crafted With Pride program," he said. The label, which features a red, white and blue star, will help consumers find goods made in America.

Monnie Broome, chairman of the S.C. Crafted With Pride committee, explained a new promotion for merchants. The Gold Seal Merchants Program will recognize those merchants whose stores carry 75 percent or more American-made goods. After taking a survey of their stock and having it verified, the merchants will be eligible for benefits such as promotional materials and advertising.

Banners, display ads, radio jingles, camera-ready logos for advertising, hang tags, and other promotional items will be sent to the Gold Seal Merchants. Articles will be sent to newspapers to help promote the Made in America theme.

After Broome's presentation, a panel fielded questions from the audience. Besides Demarest and Broome, the panel consisted of Terry May, director of public affairs for Milliken, and Ron Copsey, director of public relations for J.P. Stevens.

Asked whether fabric manufacturers are using the Crafted With Pride in U.S.A. labels, Copsey replied that the movement is not as strong as the committee had hoped. All clothing contains labels stating the country of origin, but the idea is to establish a sensitivity in the consumer for made-in-America products.

The panel revealed some interesting facts about textile manufacturing in this and other countries. Demarest said the commerce department does not have good data about foreign textiles. In other countries, the governments keep track of all such information. In fact, foreign governments are partners with industry and help subsidize many of them. Here, the government is often an adversary of business, he added.

May said there is no such thing as free trade in this country, because American manufacturers cannot carry textiles into Taiwan, Hong Kong, and China. On the other hand, those countries are free to bring goods here.

The association is pushing a bill in Congress that calls for the orderly growth of imports.

Broome explained why many American textile manufacturers use foreign-made equipment. In the '50s and '60s, American manufacturers decided they had the best technology in existence, so they abandoned research and development on new machinery. Governments in many foreign countries subsidized research for industry, and advances were made in equipment.

"Now we are trying to catch up," he said. "We have to buy foreign equipment because it is not available here."

Broome ended his remarks on an optimistic note. "We are the most productive industry in the world. We are going to survive and press forward."

Copsey said the message to the public is a vital part of the program. Commercials with well-known actors will be shown in selected areas to make people aware of the importance of buying American textiles.

The key to success, according to Broome, is for the retailer to give the consumer a choice. American consumers will buy American products if they have the chance, he said.

He earlier quoted Sam Walton, the founder of Wal-Mart: "We must realize that our American workers are our No. 1 customers."

CANADIAN SOFTWOOD LUMBER IMPORTS

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, the Commerce Department recently announced trade statistics for the first 6 months of 1985. We ran a $70 billion deficit—larger than ever before.

This huge deficit represents millions of jobs lost and key industries endangered.

One such industry is the forest products industry.

Despite the fact that we have plentiful resources and the most efficient producers in the world, the industry is endangered by a flood of Canadian imports.

In my home State of Montana, the problem is severe.

The forest products industry has been a mainstay of Montana's economy since 1845, when Father Anthony Ravalli erected our first sawmill at St. Mary's Mission in the Bitteroot Valley.

Today we have hundreds of logging operations and lumber mills. They account for thousands of jobs, and about half the income in western Montana.

We're proud that our American sawmills are the most efficient in the world.

U.S. sawmill workers have made great sacrifices to maintain that competitive edge. In fact, our workers allowed their wages to be frozen during 1981 and 1982 so that their mills could survive the recession.

Nevertheless, the U.S. industry faces hard times.

Between 1979 and 1983, labor income in the Montana forest products industry fell by 17 percent.

During roughly the same period, 9 Montana sawmills closed and 2,700 forest products workers lost their jobs. This April, Louisiana Pacific closed its Trout Creek mill and many more workers became unemployed.

The same fate has befallen forest products workers all over the country, from Maine to Georgia to Oregon.

THE STUMPAGE PROBLEM

This disruption results from a direct attack, by the Canadian Provinces and their subidized lumber mills.

As the Wall Street Journal reported this morning, Canadian imports have risen 13 percent this year. They now account for 32 percent of U.S. softwood consumption. In Montana, they account for about 40 percent.

The primary reason Canadian imports have risen so high is Canada's stumpage practices. As the International Trade Commission found in 1982, Canadian lumber mills have been able to expand their share of the United States lumber market by paying cheap prices for the right to cut timber on Government-owned land.

In the United States, this stumpage price is set by either an open auction or competitive bids.

In Canada, nearly all the timberland is owned and controlled by provincial governments. They set the price at whatever level they think necessary to keep Canadian lumber mills open and Canadian workers employed.

This policy has a dramatic impact on the U.S. industry.

THE 1983 DECISION

After the ITC studied the issue in 1982, a group of U.S. producers brought a countervailing duty action, charging that Canadian softwood imports were benefiting from illegal subsidies.

The Commerce Department rejected this petition. The cornerstone of its decision was the legal conclusion that stumpage was generally available because it was provided to the furniture industry and other wood products industries.

Since that time, one court has questioned whether—as the Commerce Department assumed—there is an implicit general availability requirement in our countervailing duty law. Even if there is, it seems absurd to interpret it the way Commerce did, permitting availability to a few related industries to constitute general availability.

In any event, subsequent events have made the true nature of Canada's stumpage practices crystal clear.

Canadian production levels are high. And U.S. consumption levels are high. Given this situation, the free play of economic forces should result in high Canadian stumpage prices.

But that has not happened. To the contrary, Canadian stumpage prices have fallen dramatically since 1982, allowing the Canadian mills to expand their U.S. market share even further. This has undermined U.S. lumber prices, reduced the profitability of U.S. lumber companies, and increased forest products industry unemployment.

Mr. President, the administration and Congress are again considering how to address this critical issue.

I believe that we should address it quickly and decisively. We should revise our countervailing duty law, to make clear that artificially low stumpage prices are illegal trade subsidies. I have introduced two bills—S. 982 and S. 1292—that would accomplish this. The distinguished chairman on the Energy Committee, Senator McCLURE, also has introduced legislation that would accomplish this.

THE ITC STUDY

An important part of our current effort is the International Trade Commission's update of its 1982 study.

Last week, the ITC held a hearing to gather testimony for this update. I had the privilege of testifying at this hearing, along with Congressman BONKER of Washington, Congressman WEAVER of Oregon, and Congressman CRAIG of Idaho.

Also presenting testimony was Mr. Stanley Dennison, chairman of the U.S. Coalition for Fair Lumber Imports. Mr. Dennison's testimony persuasively explains the harm that unfair Canadian stumpage subsidies are causing United States producers. As he says, "Free trade is fair trade and this implies that there is balance and equality in trade practices. We think something should be done to restore fair play for the American industry."

Mr. President, the Canadian softwood lumber imports will be one of the most urgent ones confronting us when Congress returns. I look forward to helping the Finance Committee and the full Senate achieve decisive resolution of the issue, so that we can move on to consider other important United States-Canadian trade issues, such as the negotiation of a free trade agreement.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of Mr. Dennison's testimony be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TESTIMONY OF STANLEY DENNISON

Good morning Madame Chairwoman and fellow Commissioners, I want to thank you for the opportunity to be here to discuss today's North American softwood lumber industry. I am Stan Dennison, Executive Vice President—Building Products for Georgia-Pacific Corporation and I am also Chairman of the U.S. Coalition for Fair Lumber Imports which represents landowners and manufacturers from every region of the country.

Georgia-Pacific is not only one of the largest manufacturers of American lumber but, to our knowledge, we are also one of the largest importers of Canadian lumber. Last year, according to our records, Georgia-Pacific purchased about 1.5 billion board feet of Canadian lumber at a cost of nearly 400 million dollars.

Georgia-Pacific has remained neutral in this controversy for a long time because of our position as both a manufacturer and importer. We have always supported policies and legislation that encourage fair trade.

We can no longer remain neutral—even though a reduction of Canadian imports could prove costly to Georgia-Pacific. These imports have reached levels that are causing a liquidation of our U.S. industry.

Today, low-cost Canadian imports account for close to one-third of all softwood lumber consumed in this country. In 1975, the Canadian lumber imports accounted for almost 19 percent of U.S. markets. In 1984 this percentage rose to more than 32 percent and it appears it will increase to 35 percent during 1985. That's overdoing the generosity of the American market.

Why are these percentages escalating? The answer is that Canadian lumber enjoys a delivered cost advantage mainly due to very low stumpage price. More than 90% of Canadian lumber production comes from federal or provincial government lands. The provincial governments use appraisal and selling methods that result in little or no cost of stumpage to the Canadian producer.

Canadian governments essentially set stumpage prices so low that Canadian lumber can be sold in the U.S. at whatever prices are needed to be competitive, regardless of how close American mills are to their own local markets. For example, stumpage prices in British Columbia interior, the largest exporting area to the U.S., are below the U.S. market in the South by $117 per thousand board feet.

In our country, one-third of timber production comes from government lands, one-third from company-owned lands, and one-third from private lands . . . where the assessed value of timber is based on bidding at competitive auctions. The differences are far too great . . . and exist because of Canadian government subsidies that U.S. producers do not enjoy from our own government. This is disrupting markets for our nation's forest products industry and is not fair trade.

In 1984, lumber consumption in the U.S. was the highest ever, yet increases in Canadian lumber imports devastated our American industry.

In just the last six years, more than 250 U.S. sawmills have closed . . . we estimate approximately 27,000 jobs have been lost because of Canadian imports. Georgia-Pacific closed a major sawmill in Arkansas because we were unable to realize sufficient prices to yield adequate profit.

It is rather staggering to close a Southern pine mill in Arkansas, while softwood from interior British Columbia is thriving in the same market.

The U.S. softwood lumber industry is as efficient as any in the world. Even in the face of dismal financial performance, the industry has invested heavily and improved productivity.

However, if Canadian lumber imports continue to flood into the United States, the resulting decline of the return on capital will be insufficient to justify continued investments in the U.S. softwood lumber industry. We will see even further liquidation of our American industry.

Moreover, if imports continue to come into the U.S. at the rate they are now, they will depress the price of stumpage in this country to the point that millions of private tree farmers will stop planting because they cannot get a fair return on their money.

Our forests wil not be replanted. They will not grow and provide income for the American tree farmer, the logger, the truck driver, the sawmill owner, and the industry's shareholder.
